There was a firm step in the hall, and through the door then came the gentleman of whom so much has been said, and who, when he was put to the test, has only demonstrated that he is by far the "cleverest" leader that the Symphony Orchestra has had for many a year.

Herr Paur, by his cordial greeting, if not in words, surely by action, expressed the pleasure it afforded him to meet the Journal's representative.

The conversation would hardly have progressed to any great extent if Mrs. Paur had not suggested that she act as interpreter.

"Herr Paur, I came to see you upon the subject of your orchestra. How do you like it as a whole?"

"To say I am well pleased would hardly express my delight with the men. They are musicians, every one, and it is a pleasure to lead such a body of men."

"Are you satisfied with the first concert, Herr Paur?"

"Very much indeed. The programme was an excellent one to try them with, and they were equal to the occasion."

"How does the Symphony Orchestra compare in your opinion with the foreign bands that you have been connected with?"

"How does it compare? Oh, I understand," said Mrs. Paur, and after a short interview she replied: "He thinks that he has as fine a body of musicians to work with as could be found."

"Do you not think that that is due to the fact that most of the men are foreigners?" asked the Journal man.

"Perhaps, but then, that is hard to say."

"Your audience on Saturday were very complimentary, Herr Paur. How do you think you are going to like the musical public of Boston?"

"Everybody has been very kind to us since our arrival, and I have no doubt I shall like you all. The reception was certainly a most warm and hearty one."

Both Herr and Mrs. Paur like the city very much. They have had more or less difficulty with the breakage in their furniture in coming over, and a carpenter has been at work for 10 days in the work of repairing.

Expressing hope that when next he should meet the Journal man he would have made rapid advancement in the language, Herr Paur bade him a pleasant "Good afternoon."

The New Conductor.

Sardie

The People Who Welcomed Him at the First Symphony Rehearsal of the Season.

[WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE.]

"Never saw so many people I know, in all my life, before, did you?" "Hardly saw a soul I knew. Wonder where everybody is!"

There you have the two extremes in the Symphony chatter of Friday afternoon. It was a crush with a big C, and there was the utmost friendliness—far and away more than mere politeness warranted—for the new conductor. His name troubled the greater number. From "Paw" to "Power-r-r" (the extra trill from the Western girls, from the Conservatory, in the "rush" gallery), there was not a possible change left unrun on the pronunciation of the name of the gentleman whose fatherland patronomic was being rolled as a troublesome morsel under the tongue.

"Image of Mr. Baermann, don't you think?" "Doesn't he look like Prof. Blank, though?" These were a few of the sotto voce remarks anent his personal appearance, when he—which is what nearly everybody called him—came first into view.

There wasn't a frill or a furbelow on his manner.

For aught there was to see, Herr Paur might have been the conductor of that same orchestra for a twelvemonth.

"EMIL PAUR, BOSTON."

The New Leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Thorndike.

On the register of the Thorndike, under date of September 30, appears the name, written in broad, straggling characters, hard to decipher.

EMIL PAUR, BOSTON.

It was set down, at a few minutes after 6 o'clock, by a heavily built man with a kind, fatherly face, long, flowing locks and a beard that was at once light in color and light in texture, which curled about his chin like that of a Norse god.

It was the autograph of Mr. Paur, who will this winter direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As he wrote the word "Boston" he observed with a satisfied smile, "I want to show that I come from a civilized place." He said this in the purest German, but Mr. John Sauerquell, the librarian of the orchestra, who came on with Mr. Paur from New York and acts as his interpreter, guide, philosopher and friend, translated the remark.

Besides Mr. Sauerquell came Mrs. Paur and the two little boys of the distinguished couple. They arrived on the last "limited" train over the Providence Division of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad, which was in on time. They walked through Church Street to the Thorndike, where rooms were assigned them, and where they will remain until Mr. Paur finds a house to his liking.

While supper was being prepared Mr. and Mrs. Paur were presented to several members of the orchestra who had made their acquaintance years before in Germany. The reunion was a happy one.

Then, as the evening was so pleasant, the whole party strolled out of doors and slowly walked up and down the shaded paths of the Public Garden. Mr. Paur looked with some astonishment at the loving couples who adorned every other bench, generally closely entwined within one another's arms, but he said nothing. The spectacle evidently surprised him.

When they were back at the hotel the newly arrived, with one or two friends, including Mrs. Paur and the little boys, sat down to tea, which lasted until a late hour.

The new leader's eyes sparkled, and they all seemed to be having a right good time. To the Journal reporter's inquiry he said that he was in the best of health and spirits and that so were all of his party. He expected to remain at the Thorndike for some time.

By-and-by the maid invaded the dining room and bore off the little boys to bed, but the older folks sat up until midnight, talking of times past, present and future.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

MAY BE HAD AT CONNELLY'S TICKET OFFICE,
ADAMS HOUSE

SYMPHONY.

After filling orders, we have a few choice seats left at low prices at CASHIN'S Ticket Agency, Young's Hotel.

SYMPHONY.

All advance orders for the rehearsals and concerts should be sent to me on or before nine o'clock Monday next, the 25th, for rehearsals, and ten o'clock Thursday morning, the 28th, for the concerts. Each order should be as explicit as possible and contain full address.

CONNELLY'S

THEATRE TICKET OFFICE,
ADAMS HOUSE.

5t[A]

8 19

1893. Symphony. 1894

Orders now booked for Rehearsal and Concert Tickets for season at

CASHIN'S TICKET AGENCY,
YOUNG'S HOTEL

1t[A]

Symphonies.

Orders fulfilled by

JOHN R. HEARD,
Theatre Ticket Agency, 43 WEST STREET.

6t[A]

8 19

SYMPHONY.

Orders taken for REHEARSALS and CONCERTS. Apply to T. B. DILLAWAY, 453 Washington Street.

7t[A]

8 16

SYMPHONY TICKETS

Two seats for Rehearsals, rear row first balcony, opposite stage. Twenty-five dollars for the two. Address G. P. O., Boston Transcript.

1t[A]

SYMPHONY TICKETS

For sale and to rent. Miss E. GOERING, 2 Hamilton place.

1t[A]

0 7

Symphony Tickets.

HEARD'S TICKET OFFICE, 43 WEST ST.

1t[A]

8 26

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

For sale, 3 seats for Saturday concerts, first balcony, numbers 521, 522 and 523; $18 each. Apply at Room 70, Equitable Building.

4t[A]

0 4

TWO CONCERT SEATS

In second row of first balcony on left side facing stage, one-half way back, bought by mistake, may be secured for $21.50 each, by addressing A. W. N., Boston Transcript.

4t[A]

0 4

TWO SATURDAY EVENING

SYMPHONY SEATS in L. Price $25 each. Address P. R. A., Boston Transcript.

2t[A]

0 6

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

I have two seats on floor in row V for $23 each. Address K. S. G., Boston Transcript.

2t[A]

0 6

EMIL PAUR.

Journal

Interview with New Leader of Symphony Orchestra.

Expresses Great Satisfaction with the Same.

Herr and Mrs. Paur Pleasantly Situated in Their New Home.

The autumn wind was blowing and the restless gusts were carrying the dead leaves about yesterday afternoon when the Journal representative alighted from the car and turned into Burroughs Street, Jamaica Plain, on his way to interview Herr Emil Paur, the now fully established leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

As that light haired and bearded musical genius does not understand the simplest word of English, and as the Journal man was equally ignorant of German, it was not without apprehension that he undertook his mission.

The Paur household has become fully settled in their comely little residence, and before the Journal man rang the bell he had opportunity to observe the well-ordered condition of the grounds.

The bell was answered by a rather stout and short German maid, with a white apron.

"Herr Paur," said the Journal man, not daring to startle her with any further inquiry in English.

"Nein" came from the maiden, with a shake of her head.

"Mrs. Paur, is she at home?" said the newspaper man, whose courage had somewhat rallied.

This remark was followed by the disappearance of the maid through the door at the end of the hall.

She presently returned, and with some expression in her native tongue and a wave of her hand the Journal man was ushered into a neatly furnished reception room.

Mrs. Paur had evidently been occupied in selecting branches of autumn leaves from the trees, for as she entered the room she held a large bunch in her hand.

"I came to see Herr Paur, but he is away, I understand."

"Yes," replied Mrs. Paur, "he has gone to make arrangements for securing an English teacher. He is so sorry that he had not the time to learn the language that he is now making hasty preparation to educate himself in that direction."

Her husband is evidently a favorite subject with Mrs. Paur, for she talked pleasantly, giving the Journal man some idea of how quickly they had decided to come to this country.

"It was in July we decided to come; so you see that we are both to be excused if we do not understand English. But we soon will," she exclaimed, with a smile.

There was a firm step in the hall, and through the door then came the gentleman of whom so much has been said, and who, when he was put to the test, has only demonstrated that he is by far the "cleverest" leader that the Symphony Orchestra has had for many a year.

Herr Paur, by his cordial greeting, if not in words, surely by action, expressed the pleasure it afforded him to meet the Journal's representative.

The conversation would hardly have progressed to any great extent if Mrs. Paur had not suggested that she act as interpreter.

"Herr Paur, I came to see you upon the subject of your orchestra. How do you like it as a whole?"

"To say I am well pleased would hardly express my delight with the men. They are musicians, every one, and it is a pleasure to lead such a body of men."

"Are you satisfied with the first concert, Herr Paur?"

"Very much indeed. The programme was an excellent one to try them with, and they were equal to the occasion."

"How does the Symphony Orchestra compare in your opinion with the foreign bands that you have been connected with?"

"How does it compare? Oh, I understand," said Mrs. Paur, and after a short interview she replied: "He thinks that he has as fine a body of musicians to work with as could be found."

"Do you not think that that is due to the fact that most of the men are foreigners?" asked the Journal man.

"Perhaps, but then, that is hard to say."

"Your audience on Saturday were very complimentary, Herr Paur. How do you think you are going to like the musical public of Boston?"

"Everybody has been very kind to us since our arrival, and I have no doubt I shall like you all. The reception was certainly a most warm and hearty one."

Both Herr and Mrs. Paur like the city very much. They have had more or less difficulty with the breakage in their furniture in coming over, and a carpenter has been at work for 10 days in the work of repairing.

Expressing hope that when next he should meet the Journal man he would have made rapid advancement in the language, Herr Paur bade him a pleasant "Good afternoon."

The New Conductor.

The People Who Welcomed Him at the First Symphony Rehearsal of the Season.

[WRITTEN FOR THE SATURDAY EVENING GAZETTE.]

"Never saw so many people I know, in all my life, before, did you?" "Hardly saw a soul I knew. Wonder where everybody is!"

There you have the two extremes in the Symphony chatter of Friday afternoon. It was a crush with a big C, and there was the utmost friendliness—far and away more than mere politeness warranted—for the new conductor. His name troubled the greater number. From "Paw" to "Power-r-r" (the extra trill from the Western girls, from the Conservatory, in the "rush" gallery), there was not a possible change left unringed on the pronunciation of the name of the gentleman whose fatherland patronomic was being rolled as a troublesome morsel under the tongue.

"Image of Mr. Baermann, don't you think?" "Doesn't he look like Prof. Blank, though?" These were a few of the sotto voce remarks anent his personal appearance, when he—which is what nearly everybody called him—came first into view.

There wasn't a frill or a furbelow on his manner.

For aught there was to see, Herr Paur might have been the conductor of that same orchestra for a twelvemonth.

40 "There isn't the scrap of a bald place. Wonder if there will be, before he leaves?" said one irreverent hoyden.

But there doesn't appear to be any immediate prospect of baldness. Indeed, Her Paur's locks, though shorn somewhat since his older pictures were "taken," are still long enough to require to be held back, to prevent them falling into his eyes when he bows.

He had to bow a great many times on Friday, and every time he made one of his odd jack-knife acknowledgements of the disposition of the audience to make him feel at home, and that they were having a good time, he carried one hand to hold his head to his hair where the slightly grizzled and fluffy mane had been brushed à la Pompadour.

There would have been a critical chill in the air had the audience lived up to the Bostonese reputation, for not only was the matinee house supposed to be weighing in to see if they could find wanting in the merit of the new conductor, but there was such a sprinkling of the professionally critical fraternity in evidence, as to make it seem much more like the Saturday concert or a regular "first-night" gathering of the authoritative clans.

All the Boston critics were on hand, or to be exact, though less idomatic, on ear; indeed, one paper had both members of its critical staff and its society reporter, by turns occupying seats in a prominent position.

Then the musicians all turned out to hear.

Also New York took us under consideration. There's proof that it was a function.

Was not Mr. Theodore Thomas in one of the seats of the elect, and not scornful?

He was. And so was Mr. Krehbiel, of the Tribune, and Mr. Henderson (likewise musical critic from the Metropolis) of the Times staff, and—and so on.

Beside these and some other people who know what is what in music, there is no disputing—probably nobody wishes to do so—that the majority couldn't have told without their programmes whether it were the Fifth or the First in the matter of "dear old Beethoven's symphony"—quotation from a jolly young thing in blue crêpon, with a white lace bib, and pale gold hair.

Certain it is, that the talk before and after and between the concert was of everything nameable under the blue canopy of heaven save and except music; that is to say, this was among the great majority.

The majority? The rehearsallites proper. Not the enthusiastic and short-nursed folk in the twenty-five cent places, who stand on one foot for an interminable hour and longer for the chance to tumble upstairs into the unreserved seats. No, not them, but the classes.

The rehearsal girl, in current fiction, is pictured as chic to a point that even a Parisian fashion plate would rustle over. But she mostly isn't.

Here and there on Friday was a good-looking girl, and here and there was one well dressed,—stylishly so,—well set up and fetching; and once in a great while a person not myopic could discover a combination of good looks and good clothes.

But seldom. Hats are the worst feature in a Boston gathering.

Gowns grow better, but hats are still pretty bad.

Wherefore? There are immensely attractive hats for sale, even in Boston; but they must stay in the bandboxes ever after, most of them. Few, seemingly, ever come to light again.

But it's ten times more of a misfortune than a fault that one's clothes jurer at one. And it's nothing to one's discredit to like to sit under the reigning influence of good music, though she may not know a suite for strings from a metronome (always provided that she doesn't pretend she does).

And it really seemed nice that the town that turned itself inside out, as to classes, in the spring, and has kept up ever since a St. Vitus-jerking series of vacations among the masses, should have turned back again. There was hand-shaking enough to set up good feeling for the rest of the winter, and the echoes of "When did you get back?" and "Have you had a, etc., etc.?" fairly made the head board above the funny little petticoated lamps over the players, reverberate these giggling and gurgling salutations.

It was warm—very warm, and Music Hall was as dingy and ill-lighted as ever; and— But there, some day there will be a new hall, and then, when the social sheep are set off in boxes from the goats in the pit, the goats will wish the old days back again. Now there is no way of distinguishing between the elegant person who paid a small fortune for her seat, and the interloper who, being "in" with a speculator, got hers for the price of a fig over and above the regular asking terms, unless, à la Dr. Holmes, you ask them to pronounce "view."

Oh, yes, speculators have friends whom they don't even think of robbing.

Speculators seemed to be having a pretty fair sort of time on Friday; fair for them, that is. Those who had season tickets unsold had no difficulty in getting two or three dollars apiece for the use of them for the hour and a half of the concert.

"Everybody" may be said to have been present. Still everybody wasn't there; not even everybody who is usually at the rehearsal; several of our most talked about society folk being out in Cook County, Ill., while others are still going hither and thither.

Several people drove in and up from their out-of-town places, where they are lingering through these delicious autumnal days, but more came in street cars and did the usual "act" afterward, of overflowing the adjacent picture gallery, or going further for a glass of something less dry than the book of the concert, or even into the few remaining high-toned downtown shops for a bit of a bargain.

Nobody's joy quite equalled that of the bevy of more or less shabby students who climbed slowly down from the gods, and were only prevented from having hysterics of admiration, by the care, needed when they got out to the street corner, to prevent them being alternately mobbed by a bobby or mangled by an electric Juggernaut.

As for who were really on the spot when the applause broke out loudly enough to make Mr. Beethoven's dusty statue rattle, one wouldn't be far out of the way who should name the entire list of knowables from Mrs. "Montie" Sears to Mrs. Nobody in particular; others were Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Lincoln, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mrs. R. G. Burrill, Miss Lawrence, the Misses Bradlee, Mrs. Homans, Miss Paine, Mrs. C. L. Sturgis, Miss Sturgis, Miss Lyman, Mr. F. L. Coolidge, Miss Ames, Mrs. D. A. Dwight, Miss Rice, Miss Codman, Mrs. P. H. Sears, Miss Lang, Mrs. W. F. Weld, Miss Hood, Lieut. C. P. Crosby, Miss Crosby, Miss Johnson, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, the Misses Winsor, Mrs. R. Winthrop, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Thorndike, Miss Florence Amory, Mrs. E. W. Pratt, Miss Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Hooper, Prof. J. K. Paine, Mr. Carl Faelten, Mr. G. C. Chadwick, Mr. Henry Parkman.

FROM 25 CENTS TO $41.

Concert Seats Sell at Only Moderate Premiums at Music Hall.

There were no crazy spasms at the auction sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts in Music Hall yesterday. The premiums were generally sober and reasonable. Some seats went higher than last year, but the average was much lower.

At the opening of the auction there were between 200 and 300 bidders, and more came later. More men were present than at the auction of the rehearsal seats.

Auctioneer Jackson tried to start the sale at $10 for the end seat in slip A, close up to the stage steps, on the Hamilton place side, but all he got was 50 cents; and the bidder, who had no competitors, took two seats. The next two brought $6.50 premium apiece; then they went from $2 to $4 for the rest of the seats in slip A, except the extreme opposite end, which did not get even a 25-cent bid.

In the next slip the seats began at $1 premium, and went up to $14 for one of the middle end seats. These are very poor seats, so near the stage that the sound of the orchestra goes over one's head; and there was more or less quaking in expectation of very high premiums when the good seats were put up.

The middle end seats of slip C brought $13 and $18 respectively; then they went up to $21, $23, $27, $40 and $41 for middle end seats in the successive slips. This was the high water mark. By one of those crochets characteristic of auctions, the middle end seat directly opposite to the $41 seat went for $20.

After this there was a drop to $32 and $36, when again the opposite middle end seat went for an absurd drop to $23. Slips K, L, M and N brought $36, $25, $23 and $25 for their middle end seats. In slip O the highest premium was only $19, but that was because the best seats in this slip were among the 53 reserved, on the floor before the sale.

The highest prices paid for seats in the next slips were $27, $20, $23, $23, $25, and so on back to the balcony posts. The corridor ends of the slips went down by degrees to $8, $5, $3, and even to 50 cents for the left corridor end of slip A A. The seat next to it inside bringing no bid.

The last three rows of the $12 seats back of the cross passage way, brought nothing except on or two end seats and a few in the centre which brought 50 cents. These are by no means poor seats, especially the first of the three rows, and if they are sold for regular box-office sale, for single concerts, the public will gain a good deal from the result of the auction. It has not been decided what will be done with the unsold tickets, of which there are some 200 or more; it will probably be announced in a day or two.

The auction of the floor seats lasted nearly four hours. After a short intermission the first balcony seats were put up. On the Hamilton place side the front row went from $4 to $40. The highest were $40, $38, $29, $26, $27, $26 and $25. The second row on this side brought from $2.50 to $18. On the Winter street side the front row brought from $1 to $30, and the second row $4 to $14.50. The rear balcony, front row, sold from $7.50 to $13, the second and third rows, 25 cents to $25, with no bids for several of the seats. The fourth and last rows went begging almost altogether.

The last sale will take place this morning at 10 o'clock, when the $7.50 seats will be put up.

SYMPHONY SALE CONTINUED.

Premiums for the $7.50 Seats Ranged Low—No Bids for Some Tickets.

This morning the $7.50 seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's rehearsals were sold by auction at Music Hall, and the prices bid were pretty low, some seats however selling at as high a premium as $23. The location of these seats was on the floor under the gallery, and in the back rows of the first balcony, some of the seats being as good as any in the hall. The bidding began with the seats under the gallery, the first one sold bringing $3.50 premium. Other seats in this same row sold as high as $10, and seats of course getting the highest prices. In the row back of this the bidding was somewhat lower, and when it came to the next two rows it was hard to get bids of even 25 cents, except on end seats, and many seats went a-begging. The next seats sold were those in the balcony, beginning at the extreme right side in the second row. From 50 cents to $10 was paid for these seats, and places in the third row near the centre of the house brought anywhere from $13 to $23. On the left hand side of the balcony the same seats, comparatively speaking, brought a somewhat lower price. In the centre of the balcony, six rows back, the seats sold for from $1 to $5 and in the rows behind these sold in some cases as low as fifty cents.

It will therefore be seen that a good many seats are still left in the hands of the management, but it is not yet announced how these will be disposed of or at what time. Few seats were bought this morning by the agents, with the exception of some in the balcony. Here all the agents bought, especially Herrick, Heard and Connolly.

THE PREMIUMS obtained at the auction of the symphony seats this year though a little off compared with the extraordinary, the "phenomenal" (as they say in the show-business), prices of last season, do not mean that "the best people" are not to be on hand in greater force than ever this winter. It is not the first chop of Bostonese who pay the fancy prices for everything. They leave that folly to the sort of people to whom wealth is such a new thing that they need to make a display of outlay. If at tomorrow morning's sale of the $12 season tickets for Saturday evening concerts the prices still remain as reasonable as thus far in the sales, we are going to see even finer and more characteristic Boston audiences at Music Hall Saturday nights the coming winter than when prices were higher. No doubt, too, the exchequer of the concerts will be the gainer; that is, in the long run and in good will, when prices come again below the range that for a year or two has been almost prohibitory for the generality of the great musical public; and certainly the main purpose of the founder of the institution will be the better realized the wider the good of the symphony concerts can be spread abroad among all classes of real music lovers without anything looking like patronizing charity.

40 "There isn't the scrap of a bald place. Wonder if there will be, before he leaves?" said one irreverent hoyden.

But there doesn't appear to be any immediate prospect of baldness. Indeed, Her Paur's locks, though shorn somewhat since his older pictures were "taken," are still long enough to require to be held back, to prevent them falling into his eyes when he bows.

He had to bow a great many times on Friday, and every time he made one of his odd jack-knife acknowledgements of the disposition of the audience to make him feel at home, and that they were having a good time, he carried one hand to hold his head to his hair where the slightly grizzled and fluffy mane had been brushed à la Pompadour.

There would have been a critical chill in the air had the audience lived up to the Bostonese reputation, for not only was the matinee house supposed to be weighing to see if they could find wanting in the merit of the new conductor, but there was such a sprinkling of the professionally critical fraternity in evidence, as to make it seem much more like the Saturday concert or a regular "first-night" gathering of the authoritative clans.

All the Boston critics were on hand, or to be exact, though less idomatic, on ear; indeed, one paper had both members of its critical staff and its society reporter, by turns occupying seats in a prominent position.

Then the musicians all turned out to hear.

Also New York took us under consideration. There's proof that it was a function.

Was not Mr. Theodore Thomas in one of the seats of the elect, and not scornful?

He was. And so was Mr. Krehbiel, of the Tribune, and Mr. Henderson (likewise musical critic from the Metropolis) of the Times staff, and—and so on.

Beside these and some other people who know what is what in music, there is no disputing—probably nobody wishes to do so—that the majority couldn't have told without their programmes whether it were the Fifth or the First in the matter of "dear old Beet's symphony"—quotation from a jolly young thing in blue crêpe, with a white lace bib, and pale gold hair.

Certain it is, that the talk before and after and between the concert was of everything nameable under the blue canopy of heaven save and except music; that is to say, this was among the great majority.

The majority? The rehearsals proper. Not the enthusiastic and short-pursed folk in the twenty-five cent places, who stand on one foot for an interminable hour and longer for the chance to tumble upstairs into the unreserved seats. No, not them, but the classes.

The rehearsal girl, in current fiction, is pictured as chic to a point that even a Parisian fashion plate would rustle over. But she mostly isn't.

Here and there on Friday was a good-looking girl, and here and there was one well dressed,—stylishly so,—well set up and fetching; and once in a great while a person not myopic could discover a combination of good looks and good clothes.

But seldom. Hats are the worst feature in a Boston gathering.

Gowns grow better, but hats are still pretty bad.

Wherefore? There are immensely attractive hats for sale, even in Boston; but they must stay in the bandboxes ever after, most of them. Few, seemingly, ever come to light again.

But it's ten times more of a misfortune than a fault that one's clothes *jur*er at one. And it's nothing to one's discredit to like to sit under the regning influence of good music, though she may not know a suite for strings from a metronome (always provided that she doesn't pretend she does).

And it really seemed nice that the town that turned itself inside out, as to classes, in the spring, and has kept up ever since a St. Vitus-jerking series of vacations among the masses, should have turned back again. There was hand-shaking enough to set up good feeling for the rest of the winter, and the echoes of "When did you get back?" and "Have you had a, etc., etc.?" fairly made the head board above the funny little petticoated lamps over the players, reverberate these giggling and gurgling salutations.

It was warm—very warm, and Music Hall was as dingy and ill-lighted as ever; and— But there, some day there will be a new hall, and then, when the social sheep are set off in boxes from the goats in the pit, the goats will wish the old days back again. Now there is no way of distinguishing between the elegant person who paid a small fortune for her seat, and the interloper who, being "in" with a speculator, got hers for the price of a fig over and above the regular asking terms, unless, à la Dr. Holmes, you ask them to pronounce "view."

Oh, yes, speculators have friends whom they don't even think of robbing.

Speculators seemed to be having a pretty fair sort of time on Friday; fair for them, that is. Those who had season tickets unsold had no difficulty in getting two or three dollars apiece for the use of them for the hour and a half of the concert.

"Everybody" may be said to have been present. Still everybody wasn't there; not even everybody who is usually at the rehearsal; several of our most talked about society folk being out in Cook County, Ill., while others are still going hither and thither.

Several people drove in and up from their out-of-town places, where they are lingering through these delicious autumnal days, but more came in street cars and did the usual "act" afterward, of overflowing the adjacent picture gallery, or going further for a glass of something less dry than the book of the concert, or even into the few remaining high-toned downtown shops for a bit of a bargain.

Nobody's joy quite equalled that of the bevy of more or less shabby students who climbed slowly down from the gods, and were only prevented from having hysterics of admiration, by the care, needed when they got out to the street corner, to prevent them being alternately mobbed by a bobby or mangled by an electric Juggernaut.

As for who were really on the spot when the applause broke out loudly enough to make Mr. Beethoven's dusty statue rattle, one wouldn't be far out of the way who should name the entire list of knowables from Mrs. "Montie" Sears to Mrs. Nobody in particular; others were Mr. and Mrs. R. C. Lincoln, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mrs. R. G. Burrill, Miss Lawrence, the Misses Bradlee, Mrs. Homans, Miss Paine, Mrs. C. L. Sturgis, Miss Sturgis, Miss Lyman, Mr. F. L. Coolidge, Miss Ames, Mrs. D. A. Dwight, Miss Rice, Miss Codman, Mrs. P. H. Sears, Miss Lang, Mrs. W. F. Weld, Miss Hood, Lieut. C. P. Crosby, Miss Crosby, Miss Johnson, Mr. Heinrich Schuecker, the Misses Winsor, Mrs. R. Winthrop, Jr., Dr. and Mrs. Thorndike, Miss Florence Amory, Mrs. E. W. Pratt, Miss Perkins, Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Hooper, Prof. J. K. Paine, Mr. Carl Faeltten, Mr. G. C. Chadwick, Mr. Henry Parkman.

FROM 25 CENTS TO $41.

Concert Seats Sell at Only Moderate Premiums at Music Hall.

There were no crazy spasms at the auction sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts in Music Hall yesterday. The premiums were generally sober and reasonable. Some seats went higher than last year, but the average was much lower.

At the opening of the auction there were between 200 and 300 bidders, and more came later. More men were present than at the auction of the rehearsal seats.

Auctioneer Jackson tried to start the sale at $10 for the end seat in slip A, close up to the stage steps, on the Hamilton place side, but all he got was 50 cents; and the bidder, who had no competitors, took two seats. The next two brought $6.50 premium apiece; then they went from $2 to $4 for the rest of the seats in slip A, except the extreme opposite end, which did not get even a 25-cent bid.

In the next slip the seats began at $1 premium, and went up to $14 for one of the middle end seats. These are very poor seats, so near the stage that the sound of the orchestra goes over one's head; and there was more or less quaking in expectation of very big premiums when the good seats were put up.

The middle end seats of slip C brought $13 and $18 respectively; then they went up to $21, $23, $27, $40 and $41 for middle end seats in the successive slips. This was the high water mark. By one of those crotchets characteristic of auctions, the middle end seat directly opposite to the $41 seat went for $20.

After this there was a drop to $32 and $36, when again the opposite middle end seat went for an absurd drop to $23. Slips K, L, M and N brought $36, $25, $23 and $25 for their middle end seats. In slip O the highest premium was only $19, but that was because the best seats in this slip were among the 53 reserved on the floor before the sale.

The highest prices paid for seats in the next slips were $27, $20, $23, $23, $25, and so on back to the balcony posts. The corridor ends of the slips went down by degrees to $8, $5, $3, and even to 50 cents for the left corridor end of slip A A. The seat next to it inside bringing no bid.

The last three rows of the $12 seats back of the cross passage way, brought nothing except on or two end seats and a few in the centre which brought 50 cents. These are by no means poor seats, especially the first of the three rows, and if they are sold for regular box-office sale, for single concerts, the public will gain a good deal from the result of the auction. It has not been decided what will be done with the unsold tickets, of which there are some 200 or more; it will probably be announced in a day or two.

The auction of the floor seats lasted nearly four hours. After a short intermission the first balcony seats were put up. On the Hamilton place side the front row went from $4 to $40. The highest were $40, $38, $29, $26, $27, $26 and $25. The second row on this side brought from $2.50 to $18. On the Winter street side the front row brought from $1 to $30, and the second row $4 to $14.50. The rear balcony, front row, sold from $7.50 to $13, the second and third rows, 25 cents to $25, with no bids for several of the seats. The fourth and last rows went begging almost altogether.

The last sale will take place this morning at 10 o'clock, when the $7.50 seats will be put up.

SYMPHONY SALE CONTINUED.

Premiums for the $7.50 Seats Ranged Low—No Bids for Some Tickets.

This morning the $7.50 seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's rehearsals were sold by auction at Music Hall, and the prices bid were pretty low, some seats however selling at as high a premium as $23. The location of these seats was on the floor under the gallery, and in the back rows of the first balcony, some of the seats being as good as any in the hall. The bidding began with the seats under the gallery, the first one sold bringing $3.50 premium. Other seats in this same row sold as high as $10, end seats of course getting the highest prices. In the row back of this the bidding was somewhat lower, and when it came to the next two rows it was hard to get bids of even 25 cents, except on end seats, and many seats went a-begging. The next seats sold were those in the balcony, beginning at the extreme right side in the second row. From 50 cents to $10 was paid for these seats, and places in the third row near the centre of the house brought any where from $13 to $23. On the left hand side of the balcony the same seats, comparatively speaking, brought a somewhat lower price. In the centre of the balcony, six rows back, the seats sold for from $1 to $5 and in the rows behind these sold in some cases as low as fifty cents.

It will therefore be seen that a good many seats are still left in the hands of the management, but it is not yet announced how these will be disposed of or at what time. Few seats were bought this morning by the agents, with the exception of some in the balcony. Here all the agents bought, especially Herrick, Heard and Connolly.

THE PREMIUMS obtained at the auction of the symphony seats this year though a little off compared with the extraordinary, the "phenomenal" (as they say in the show-business), prices of last season, do not mean that "the best people" are not to be on hand in greater force than ever this winter. It is not the first chop of Bostonese who pay the fancy prices for everything. They leave that folly to the sort of people to whom wealth is such a new thing that they need to make a display of outlay. If at tomorrow morning's sale of the $12 season tickets for Saturday evening concerts the prices still remain as reasonable as thus far in the sales, we are going to see even finer and more characteristic Boston audiences at Music Hall Saturday nights the coming winter than when prices were higher. No doubt, too, the exchequer of the concerts will be the gainer; that is, in the long run and in good will, when prices come again below the range that for a year or two has been almost prohibitory for the generality of the great musical public; and certainly the main purpose of the founder of the institution will be the better realized the wider the good of the symphony concerts can be spread abroad among all classes of real music lovers without anything looking like patronizing charity.

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Twelve-Dollar Symphony Concert Tickets Sell at Prices Much Below Those of Previous Years.

Although there was a large number of people at the auction sale of the twelve-dollar symphony concert seats this morning, the bidding was exceedingly slow. The prices paid were much lower than in previous years, the highest premium bid being $41 for three end seats in H. The end seats in the right aisle of G, which Mrs. John L. Gardner paid $45 for as rehearsal seats, sold this morning for $29, and this bid illustrates the comparative difference between the rehearsal and concert prices. On the opposite side of the aisle from the seats that brought $29 premium, the price paid was $40; but only eight or ten seats sold at as high a premium as that. End seats at the extreme right and left sold for from $3 to $11 premium, but the prices bid on these seats was very erratic, the left end seat in J selling for $5.50, and the right end in K for $14.

The best seats in the centre of the house were bought for $20 and in several cases these were end seats. The speculators bought in just about the same proportion as at the rehearsal seat auction. No doubt the musical public of Boston is a little uncertain in its opinions concerning the new conductor and the nature of the concerts he will give, and for that reason is holding off, for the time being, from buying the Symphony concert seats.

The $7.50 seats for the Symphony concerts will be sold by auction in Music Hall tomorrow at 10 A. M.

SYMPHONY TICKETS

MAY BE HAD AT CONNELLY'S TICKET OFFICE,
ADAMS HOUSE.

Symphony Tickets.

HEARD'S TICKET OFFICE, 43 WEST ST.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

For sale, 3 seats for Saturday concerts, first balcony, numbers 521, 522 and 523; $18 each. Apply at Room 70, Equitable Building.

TWO CONCERT SEATS

In second row of first balcony on left side facing stage, one-half way back, bought by mistake, may be secured for $21.50 each, by addressing A. W. N., Boston Transcript.

TWO SATURDAY EVENING

SYMPHONY SEATS in L. Price $25 each. Address P. R. A., Boston Transcript.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

I have two seats on floor in row V for $23 each. Address K. S. G., Boston Transcript.

SYMPHONY REHEARSALS

After filling orders, have a few seats left. 63 Harrison Avenue, Room A, 9 to 10 A. M.

CROWDS IN ATTENDANCE.

From Journal Oct 13/93
Music Hall Packed at the First Symphony Rehearsal.

Young maidens and old maidens, ladies attired in rustling silks, music teachers by the score and crowds of laughing school girls. These, with a sprinkling of men, assembled at the Music Hall entrance today, shortly after two o'clock. Hamilton Place was filled with carriages, for it was the first symphony rehearsal. Many acquaintances met for the first time since the winter season closed, and there was much hand-shaking, comments upon trips abroad and at home. Of course there was the usual crowd of late arrivals. They rushed breathlessly into the outer corridor and then stood as close to the walls as possible to hear the storm of applause that told the appearance of Emil Paur. When these had been admitted, another lot arrived, hoping to be "just in time," and catching the faint strains of the orchestra, stood in groups with bent heads, listening reverently.

Symphony Orchestra Season.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will enter upon its 13th season under conditions which promise to make it exceedingly interesting. The change in conductor is already known to all who follow current musical events, and the appearance of Mr. Emil Paur at the head of the orchestra will be awaited with the liveliest interest.

All accounts agree that he is the possessor of great qualities as a conductor. His undoubted ability and his achievements in the positions which he has held abroad give assurance of satisfactory results when he shall have assumed the duties of his high position. The orchestra long ago assumed the leading place among musical organizations of the country, and the management will leave nothing undone to maintain its position and to make the concerts of the coming season artistically the equal of any in the world.

The magnificent body of instrumentalists, so carefully selected during the last 12 years, will remain practically unchanged. A notable addition to the ranks of the first violins is Mr. Oudrcek, formerly concert-master of the Prague orchestra. Mr. Kneisel will again lead the violins, supported by Mr. Loeffler, Mr. Adamowski and other able violinists.

Messrs. Svecenski, Schroder, Goldstein, Mole, Santet, Goldschmidt, Gutter, Hackebarth, Abloescher, Golde and Ludwig will as before head their respective departments. Mr. Schaefer has been reengaged as harpist.

The season will consist as usual of 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings. The dates of the first performances will be Oct 13 and 14.

The soloists already engaged include several artists of great reputation who have never been heard here. The list is said to be the strongest ever presented in these concerts, and will add greatly to the attractions of the season.

The season tickets will be sold at auction at Music hall, Sept 25, 26, 28 and 29. The rehearsal seats will be sold on Monday and Tuesday, Sept 25 and 26, and the concert tickets on Thursday and Friday, Sept 28 and 29.

WITH MRS. PAUR.

Journal Oct 4/93
The Wife of the Leader of the Symphony Orchestra.

She Tells the Journal Writer About Her Plans.

Her New Boston Home, Her Children and Herself.

Sprechen sie Deutsch?

If not, then the Journal will give to its readers, in English, the first interview obtained in America with the wife of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's new conductor.

A very quiet little woman is Mrs. Paur, and as genial and pleasant as she is quiet. She gave a most cordial welcome to the Journal's representative, who called yesterday morning at the pleasant apartment temporarily occupied by the Pairs in the Thorndike.

"Do you speak German?" she asked in English, much to the relief of her caller.

"A little," was the reply; "but perhaps there is no need of my speaking German, since I see you speak English."

"Not very much. You see, I learned my English in school, and that was a long time ago," she said, and her arch smile was accompanied by a graceful shrug of the shoulders—that trick which all must learn if they would appear foreign.

"So few people speak German in Boston," she continued. "It is quite different from New York. Almost everyone speaks German there." Even in the stores of Gotham nearly everybody speaks German, but it is feared that in the stores of cultured Boston they are not so accomplished.

Mrs. Paur was surprised to learn that in Boston schools there was a choice between German and French, and that only in the high schools.

"Why, in all the best schools for young ladies at home they are obliged to study both English and French, as well as their own language. But it has been so long since I went to school," she said, with a merry twinkle in her handsome brown eyes, "that I have forgotten nearly all of my English words." One would hardly think however, that she had left her school days far behind, for the regular, clearly defined features of her pleasant face, which is crowned by natural waves of soft brown hair, give her a particularly youthful appearance. Her becoming morning gown, too, made after the German mode, was of dark blue material finished with black, and set off her trim, stylish figure to the best advantage.

MARIE PAUR-BURGER,
wife of the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

take.

But nevertheless it has been twelve years, at least, since she was a school girl, for she was married to Mr. Paur in 1881.

"You have never been in America before, I believe?" said the Journal's caller to Mrs. Paur. "No," she said, "this is my first visit here and I find America very pleasant. But I felt very sorry to leave all my German friends at home."

"But you will soon make new friends here."

"Oh, yes, I am sure of that. Everyone is very kind to us. I had no friends at all, here in America, although Mr. Paur knew a few of the musical people. But we have met quite a number already, and they have done what they could to make it pleasant for us," and she glanced significantly at the large basket of roses and bouquet of lilies-of-the-valley which filled the apartments with their fragrance.

"We spent last evening at the home of Mr. Kneisel, in Brookline," continued Mrs. Paur, referring to the talented violinist who sits at the first desk in the Symphony Orchestra. "They are very pleasant people, and I think Mrs. Kneisel is charming."

"Did you know them before you came to America?"

"No, we knew them here," she said, in her quiet little way. "But I am sure we shall enjoy them very much."

"Brookline is a beautiful town, is it not?" again asked the caller from the Journal.

"Oh, very! I think the drives there are so pleasant. But I have not seen so much of Brookline as of Jamaica Plain. We have taken a house in Jamaica Plain, on Burroughs Street,

MR. AND MRS. PAUR'S BOSTON HOME.

No. 28 Burroughs Street, Jamaica Plain, is an unassuming building, half hidden from the street by a large horse-chestnut tree, which just now, with its yellowing leaves, stands out in strong contrast to the brown-walled house. The grounds, though limited, are very pleasing, there being a number of shrubs and flowering plants in beds, while against the fence is a rose hedge, which in the time of bloom must be a delight to the residents. A smooth driveway leads to a cosy little stable in the rear of the house.

and yesterday afternoon, when we were looking, we took a long drive."

"And have you found a house so soon?" asked her caller in some amazement.

"Yes, we have found quite a pretty one, and have decided to take it. It is very near the street cars and only about 10 minutes' walk from the steam cars. It is quite near Pond Street, too, which is the pleasantest place we saw."

It is with true German enterprise that the Paur family go house hunting. In one afternoon they found a house, and when asked how soon they expected to move into their new home Mrs. Paur said:

"By the last of this week we expect to move in. It is very pleasant here at the hotel,"—and, indeed, the apartment is one of the pleasantest in the Thorndike, overlooking the Public Gardens, which are in the height of their fall beauty—"but we do not like hotel life, and would much rather have a home of our own."

"Did you bring over furniture from Germany?"

"Oh, yes, indeed; but I am not sure what we will do with it," she said, with a look of comic dismay. "Why, your American furniture is so small!" And she thinks the houses are made to fit the furniture.

"Our furniture is so large I do not know how we can get it into the house, the rooms seem so much smaller and lower than they are at home. But we shall be glad to have a house by ourselves. That will be better than what we had in Leipzig, for there are very few private houses there, you know. Nearly all of them are apartments."

Mrs. Paur's voyage from Europe was somewhat tedious, as she was very sick all the way. But she magnanimously says it is a beautiful trip.

"I was in my berth all the way until the very last day," she said. "But Mr. Paur was not sick at all, and enjoyed the trip very much."

"You did not stay in New York long enough to form much of an idea of the city, I presume?" said the Journal's representative.

"Well, of course, we could not see it all, but

I think we saw the most beautiful part of the place," said Mrs. Paur. "We were only there two days, but we took a very long drive. We saw the beautiful residences and Central Park, and also went to Riverside Park, where we had a beautiful view of the Hudson River."

"Were you glad to have Mr. Paur come to America?"

"Oh, yes, it is such a very fine position," said Mrs. Paur. "And then the Symphony is such a fine orchestra, I am sure he will enjoy working with them very much. You know D'Albert says the Symphony is one of the best orchestras in the world."

When asked if she expected to appear in public herself, Mrs. Paur said: "Perhaps, although I am not sure yet. I am not anxious for notoriety," she added with a little laugh.

It is tolerably safe to assume, however, that Bostonians will not permit Mrs. Paur to remain very long in their vicinity unheard, for her musical gifts are pronounced to be very rare. She began her musical studies at Stuttgart, but went from there to Mannheim. She was greatly encouraged by the best masters to pursue her studies most diligently, and it was in accordance with the advice of Rubinstein that she studied with Lescheditzki and his wife, Annetta Essipoff.

"You have played in Leipzig a good deal, have you not?" asked the caller from the Journal.

"Yes; both alone and with Mr. Paur. We like best to play together on two pianos."

Their little sons, too, are very musical, for

CHILDREN OF MR. AND MRS. PAUR.

they have two, respectively 10 and 8 years of age.

"They are very fond of music of all kinds," said the justly proud mother, "although the older one cares more for books than for studying music. He likes to hear it, but he does not enjoy practicing. The younger one, however, plays quite well for a little fellow and practices quite a good deal."

Mr. and Mrs. Paur are much devoted to their music, and, in Leipzig, were always busy with their practicing and public work. Graciously, accomplished and vivacious they were highly esteemed by a large number of German friends. The programmes of their concerts always consisted of selections of rarest delicacy and most exceptional value from favorite composers, and Bostonians may well look forward to a musical season which will afford unusual attractions, and fulfill the highest expectations of musical and critical Boston.

HELEN MAR SHAW.

Already there come complaints of the annoyances caused by thoughtless attendants at the Symphony concerts. They whisper and hum, not very loud, to be sure, but just loud enough to make their neighbors miserable. If they will only reflect that the buzz of a mosquito is more annoying than the blast of a hundred trumpets they will probably refrain from giving cause for complaints.

CROCHETS AND QUAVERS.

E HAS COME; he has seen and been seen by a select few, your humble servant among the number, and he is soon to have his opportunity to conquer.

To whom do I refer? Why to Emil Paur, our new Symphony conductor, to be sure. Mr. Paur is at present enjoying Mr. Damon's expensive hospitality at "The Thorndike," but soon hopes to build himself a nest in one of our pleasant suburbs, Jamaica Plain possibly.

If one may judge at all from the printed interviews, Mr. Paur is possessed of a large amount of tact, for he has been plied with the usual test questions, as to "how he enjoyed his voyage," "was he favorably impressed with America," "in his opinion how did the musicians of his country compare with our own and others," "what school of music he favored," etc., and while he has not been found wanting, he certainly has not been committal in these matters. We congratulate him on possessing tact, he will need it we think. Is it not so?

If Mr. Paur differs from his predecessors as much in temperament as he does in personal appearance we may expect innovations of a pronounced type, for the gentleman is light as to complexion, sandy as to beard, and his eyes blue and laughing. Totally at variance you see with the "passionate" Henschel, conservative Gericke, or the "sensational" Nikisch, who have all been dark haired and of pallid skin.

He brings with him his wife and two sons. Mrs. Paur is a pianist of repute in her own country, a pupil of Essipoff, so great a favorite in America, and of Leschetitzky. She will be heard in public ere long and each of us may judge for his or herself.

This is the second time Mr. Paur has succeeded Mr. Nikisch as conductor, the first time being at Leipzig some few years ago. He then not only replaced Nikisch, who was the people's idol, but supplanted him in their critical affection after a very short time. We shall see if that will be the case here.

As I was crossing the Common the other day, my eye was attracted to a sheet of paper at my feet, and upon which I was about to step. Now as a sheet of paper is not a rarity to me and as it was difficult for my foot, from its size, to overcome the inertia of motion, I stepped on the paper and should have passed on, but that I was seized with an impulse I could not account for, to pick up that paper. I did so and found it to be a letter from which the envelope had been torn and intended for Emil Paur.

MR. AND MRS. PAUR'S BOSTON HOME.

No. 23 Burroughs Street, Jamaica Plain, is an unassuming building, half hidden from the street by a large horse-chestnut tree, which just now, with its yellowing leaves, stands out in strong contrast to the brown-walled house. The grounds, though limited, are very pleasing, there being a number of shrubs and flowering plants in beds, while against the fence is a rose hedge, which in the time of bloom must be a delight to the residents. A smooth driveway leads to a cozy little stable in the rear of the house.

and yesterday afternoon, when we were looking, we took a long drive."

"And have you found a house so soon?" asked her caller in some amazement.

"Yes, we have found quite a pretty one, and have decided to take it. It is very near the street cars and only about 10 minutes' walk from the steam cars. It is quite near Pond Street, too, which is the pleasantest place we saw."

It is with true German enterprise that the Paur family go house hunting. In one afternoon they found a house, and when asked how soon they expected to move into their new home Mrs. Paur said:

"By the last of this week we expect to move in. It is very pleasant here at the hotel,"—and, indeed, the apartment is one of the pleasantest in the Thorndike, overlooking the Public Gardens, which are in the height of their fall beauty—"but we do not like hotel life, and would much rather have a home of our own."

"Did you bring over furniture from Germany?"

"Oh, yes, indeed; but I am not sure what we will do with it," she said, with a look of comic dismay. "Why, your American furniture is so small!" And she thinks the houses are made to fit the furniture.

"Our furniture is so large I do not know how we can get it into the house, the rooms seem so much smaller and lower than they are at home. But we shall be glad to have a house by ourselves. That will be better than what we had in Leipzig, for there are very few private houses there, you know. Nearly all of them are apartments."

Mrs. Paur's voyage from Europe was somewhat tedious, as she was very sick all the way. But she magnanimously says it is a beautiful trip.

"I was in my berth all the way until the very last day," she said. "But Mr. Paur was not sick at all, and enjoyed the trip very much."

"You did not stay in New York long enough to form much of an idea of the city, I presume?" said the Journal's representative.

"Well, of course, we could not see it all, but

I think we saw the most beautiful part of the place," said Mrs. Paur. "We were only there two days, but we took a very long drive. We saw the beautiful residences and Central Park.

and also went to Riverside Park, where we had a beautiful view of the Hudson River."

"Were you glad to have Mr. Paur come to America?"

"Oh, yes, it is such a very fine position," said Mrs. Paur. "And then the Symphony is such a fine orchestra, I am sure he will enjoy working with them very much. You know D'Albert says the Symphony is one of the best orchestras in the world."

When asked if she expected to appear in public herself, Mrs. Paur said: "Perhaps, although I am not sure yet. I am not anxious for notoriety," she added with a little laugh.

It is tolerably safe to assume, however, that Bostonians will not permit Mrs. Paur to remain very long in their vicinity unheard, for her musical gifts are pronounced to be very rare. She began her musical studies at Stuttgart, but went from there to Mannheim. She was greatly encouraged by the best masters to pursue her studies most diligently, and it was in accordance with the advice of Rubinstein that she studied with Leschetitzki and his wife, Annetta Essipoff.

"You have played in Leipzig a good deal, have you not?" asked the caller from the Journal.

"Yes; both alone and with Mr. Paur. We like best to play together on two pianos."

Their little sons, too, are very musical, for

CHILDREN OF MR. AND MRS. PAUR.

they have two, respectively 10 and 8 years of age.

"They are very fond of music of all kinds," said the justly proud mother. "although the older one cares more for books than for studying music. He likes to hear it, but he does not enjoy practicing. The younger one, however, plays quite well for a little fellow and practices quite a good deal."

Mr. and Mrs. Paur are much devoted to their music, and, in Leipzig, were always busy with their practicing and public work. Gracious, accomplished and vivacious they were highly esteemed by a large number of German friends. The programmes of their concerts always consisted of selections of rarest delicacy and most exceptional value from favorite composers, and Bostonians may well look forward to a musical season which will afford unusual attractions, and fulfill the highest expectations of musical and critical Boston.

HELEN MAR SHAW.

Already there come complaints of the annoyances caused by thoughtless attendants at the Symphony concerts. They whisper and hum, not very loud, to be sure, but just loud enough to make their neighbors miserable. If they will only reflect that the buzz of a mosquito is more annoying than the blast of a hundred trumpets they will probably refrain from giving cause for complaints.

CROCHETS AND QUAVERS.

E HAS COME; he has seen and been seen by a select few, your humble servant among the number, and he is soon to have his opportunity to conquer.

To whom do I refer? Why to Emil Paur, our new Symphony conductor, to be sure. Mr. Paur is at present enjoying Mr. Damon's expensive hospitality at "The Thorndike," but soon hopes to build himself a nest in one of our pleasant suburbs, Jamaica Plain possibly.

If one may judge at all from the printed interviews, Mr. Paur is possessed of a large amount of tact, for he has been plied with the usual test questions, as to "how he enjoyed his voyage," "was he favorably impressed with America," "in his opinion how did the musicians of his country compare with our own and others," "what school of music he favored," etc., and while he has not been found wanting, he certainly has not been committal in these matters. We congratulate him on possessing tact, he will need it we think. Is it not so?

If Mr. Paur differs from his predecessors as much in temperament as he does in personal appearance we may expect innovations of a pronounced type, for the gentleman is light as to complexion, sandy as to beard, and his eyes blue and laughing. Totally at variance you see with the "passionate" Henschel, conservative Gericke, or the "sensational" Nikisch, who have all been dark haired and of pallid skin.

He brings with him his wife and two sons. Mrs. Paur is a pianist of repute in her own country, a pupil of Essipoff, so great a favorite in America, and of Leschetitzky. She will be heard in public ere long and each of us may judge for his or herself.

This is the second time Mr. Paur has succeeded Mr. Nikisch as conductor, the first time being at Leipzig some few years ago. He then not only replaced Nikisch, who was the people's idol, but supplanted him in their critical affection after a very short time. We shall see if that will be the case here.

As I was crossing the Common the other day, my eye was attracted to a sheet of paper at my feet, and upon which I was about to step. Now as a sheet of paper is not a rarity to me and as it was difficult for my foot, from its size, to overcome the inertia of motion, I stepped on the paper and should have passed on, but that I was seized with an impulse I could not account for, to pick up that paper. I did so and found it to be a letter from which the envelope had been torn and intended for Emil Paur.

46

How it came there will always remain a mystery, probably the old story of the messenger boy who stopped to gossip or play marbles with his mates; at any rate, being in too dilapidated a condition to remail, it seemed to me that it might be a good thing to print it in these columns, that the effort of some well wisher of Mr. Paur might not be wholly lost. Here it is:—

.....
Parker House, Oct. 1st, '93.

My dear Mr. Paur:—As you are a stranger and in a foreign land, it seems but fair that some one should give you a few points as to what lies before you, that you may not be subjected to too many shocks, either of joy or sorrow, for the joys and sorrows of a musician in this city are pretty sure to be well intermingled, and it really depends upon his or her start, as to which predominates. Of course, I know that any one who does what I am doing is always considered officious and is never thanked, but I am willing to immolate myself upon the altar of my unknown friendship for you. I shall have some compensation in the way of being able to say, "I told you so" as things progress.

We Bostonians are, as you may have heard, a cultured and learned people. The first quality is indicated by our oftentimes rude manner (the prerogative of cultured people), and the latter by the prevalence of eyeglasses among us. We have also, I may say, a reserve force of brain power, which we don't use every day, for we are a thrifty people and like to keep something for great occasions. This fact will account to you for many things you may see or hear in the next five years. This country differs from your own in that it is the women who are all powerful, instead of the men. Boston is essentially a woman's city in most points, and where you find women you find "Fads," and the latest one is "Faddism." This is a quality that allows merit to pass by unnoticed very frequently, while mediocrity is raised to a pedestal. However, there is no need of enlarging upon this topic, for such will not be your fate at present, for your position in itself commands respect, and your sex will insure to you adulation. This is another point for future use.

The women being sure to endorse you, you will not lack for the support of their fathers, husbands and brothers. Therefore, socially, you may be considered "in it."

As for the critics, well, as Kipling says, "that is another matter." They are, generally speaking, highly cultured, broad-minded gentlemen in whom prejudice is a thing unprecedented. Still, if you would be popular with them, I wouldn't show too much originality or make any daring flights. We are conservative people, and our critics don't like that sort of thing. Your demeanor must be just "betwixt and between," for if you show too much temperament, you will be found "dramatic," and if too little, "stolid."

For the musicians, well, I wouldn't make too many changes in the orchestra, for they all have friends, and our friends in this part of the country are loyal—to us. It might not be pleasant, you know. Well, my dear Mr. Paur, my best wishes will be with you on the occasion of your debut, and if you see fit to try to follow any of the suggestions I have made, you cannot possibly get more tangled up than you will if you try the plan of minding your own business and doing your duty. I am, my very dear sir,

Yours most sincerely,
A MEDDLER.

PAUR REIGNS.

globe
New Capellmeister Has a Symphony Triumph.

Fair Rehearsal Girl Declares
He is Inspiring.

Nervous, Quick, Active, He
is Energetic.

His Bow is as Distinctive as
His Conducting.

Hears Every Note, Pats Feet
and Wiggles Legs.

Herr Emile Paur has placed himself before the critical scrutiny of the symphony rehearsal girl, and also her discriminating mama.

He has triumphed.

As one young woman whose experience has extended through the administrations of both Nikisch and Gericke said, "Why, isn't he inspiring? I absolutely forgot to watch him after the first few minutes. He isn't handsome or even graceful, but he makes you forget all about himself."

This comment was particularly descriptive of the new Symphony director's appearance, and was heard repeated by a number during the brief intermissions between the numbers.

A striking characteristic of the new director is the very obvious consideration he gives to the members of the orchestra. To them he is particularly gracious, and yesterday, before turning to the audience to bow to the torrent of enthusiasm that was manifested, he made a quick nod and gesture of approval, accompanied by a smile, to the players, as if anxious to devise a share of the success to them.

Herr Paur will be a popular conductor as far as the orchestra is concerned. His name is calculated to win the highest respect from them. That is a very valuable point in favor of the new capellmeister.

The symphony audience went to see him with very little knowledge of his personality, with, probably, no very deep-seated impressions, and they showed him that they liked him by the prolonged applause that followed the finale of the serial numbers and by the outburst after the concluding number.

He is not at all like Nikisch, the man who for two years was the very idol of symphony attendants. He is the greatest possible antithesis to the old leader.

Where Nikisch was calm, easy, with the natural, unstudied abandon in the makeup of a thorough Bohemian, Paur is nervous, quick, constantly active, the very embodiment of energy and constantly showing the enthusiasm he is imbued with.

HERR PAUR HUSHING THE FIRST VIOLINS.

Where the former conductor was always admirably graceful, whether waving his baton or in bowing to accept his reward from the assemblage, the new director is ever possessed with the air of business and has very little of what might be called the talents and accomplishments of the social end of the leader's stand.

But when he gets thoroughly down to business he charms because of the results he obtains.

As one critic said, "He doesn't do things quite as easy as did Nikisch," and this suggests the two dominating characteristics of the personality of the two men.

Nikisch was magnetic.

Paur is energetic.

Both men are excellent examples of their class.

It is just 2.33 p m, three minutes past the usual hour for the commencement of the rehearsal, and the hall is crowded, with everybody on the edge of their seat waiting for the appearance of the new leader.

Soon the head of the symphony librarian

HERR PAUR APPEALING TO THE BASSES.

appears at the entrance to the left of the stage as he reconnoiters, and everybody knows that Herr Paur is to follow.

So he does, but he walks across the front so quickly, as if in a hurry to get to his place, that he has reached the small, red-carpeted conductor's stand before the audience really have time to arrive at the fortissimo of enthusiasm.

Herr Paur steps upon the stand, turns to the house and bows three times at the greeting.

At the outset the new director sets his auditors a talking. His bow is a unique one.

Placing both feet near together his head goes down suddenly and does not stop until his body and limbs are almost at right angles, and then he places his left hand into his long hair over his ear and hangs on to it while he executes a few short, quick bows with his head without straightening up.

The Paur bow is destined to be a distinctive feature in the conversation about the director personally.

Herr Paur wears a black frock coat, which is unbuttoned, but does not open enough to show his vest, and his trousers are of dark striped material.

His long, sandy hair is parted in the middle, but unlike most hirsute growths of the character it does not fly about as he exerts himself. No matter how Herr Paur waves his arms and shakes his head that hair never moves a particle.

The conductor stands nervously rubbing his beard about his mouth and looking over the house for the few moments that precede the opening chords of the first number.

He turns toward the orchestra, gives his baton a short, sharp wave, and the rehearsal has commenced.

It is in the first few moments that the audience sees the remarkable distinctiveness of Paur's manner of conducting.

He uses his whole body.

With the small baton in the right hand he directs with precise, incisive strokes as he moves his arm about, running from the second violins on his right through basses, reeds and brasses to the first violins on his left.

Then his left hand comes into play as he gesticulates to the players on his left, and soon his head is nodding vigorously, as with his body bent over he is looking

How it came there will always remain a mystery, probably the old story of the messenger boy who stopped to gossip or play marbles with his mates; at any rate, being in too dilapidated a condition to remain, it seemed to me that it might be a good thing to print it in these columns, that the effort of some well wisher of Mr. Paur might not be wholly lost. Here it is.—

Parker House, Oct. 1st, '93.

My dear Mr. Paur:—As you are a stranger and in a foreign land, it seems but fair that some one should give you a few points as to what lies before you, that you may not be subjected to too many shocks, either of joy or sorrow, for the joys and sorrows of a musician in this city are pretty sure to be well intermingled, and it really depends upon his or her start, as to which predominates. Of course, I know that any one who does what I am doing is always considered officious and is never thanked, but I am willing to immolate myself upon the altar of my unknown friendship for you. I shall have some compensation in the way of being able to say, "I told you so" as things progress.

We Bostonians are, as you may have heard, a cultured and learned people. The first quality is indicated by our oftentimes rude manner (the prerogative of cultured people), and the latter by the prevalence of eyeglasses among us. We have also, I may say, a reserve force of brain power, which we don't use every day, for we are a thrifty people and like to keep something for great occasions. This fact will account to you for many things you may see or hear in the next five years. This country differs from your own in that it is the women who are all powerful, instead of the men. Boston is essentially a woman's city in most points, and where you find women you find "Fads," and the latest one is "Faddism." This is a quality that allows merit to pass by unnoticed very frequently, while mediocrity is raised to a pedestal. However, there is no need of enlarging upon this topic, for such will not be your fate at present, for your position in itself commands respect, and your sex will insure to you adulation. This is another point for future use.

The women being sure to endorse you, you will not lack for the support of their fathers, husbands and brothers. Therefore, socially, you may be considered "in it."

As for the critics, well, as Kipling says, "that is another matter." They are, generally speaking, highly cultured, broad-minded gentlemen in whom prejudice is a thing unprecedented. Still, if you would be popular with them, I wouldn't show too much originality or make any daring flights. We are conservative people, and our critics don't like that sort of thing. Your demeanor must be just "betwixt and between," for if you show too much temperament, you will be found "dramatic," and if too little, "stolid."

For the musicians, well, I wouldn't make too many changes in the orchestra, for they all have friends, and our friends in this part of the country are loyal to us. It might not be pleasant, you know. Well, my dear Mr. Paur, my best wishes will be with you on the occasion of your debut, and if you see fit to try to follow any of the suggestions I have made, you cannot possibly get more tangled up than you will if you try the plan of minding your own business and doing your duty. I am, my very dear sir,

Yours most sincerely,
A MEDDLER.

PAUR REIGNS.

New Capellmeister Has a
Symphony Triumph.

Fair Rehearsal Girl Declares
He is Inspiring.

Nervous, Quick, Active, He
is Energetic.

His Bow is as Distinctive as
His Conducting.

Hears Every Note, Pats Feet
and Wiggles Legs.

Herr Emile Paur has placed himself before the critical scrutiny of the symphony rehearsal girl, and also her discriminating mama.

He has triumphed.

As one young woman whose experience has extended through the administrations of both Nikisch and Gericke said, "Why, isn't he inspiring? I absolutely forgot to watch him after the first few minutes. He isn't handsome or even graceful, but he makes you forget all about himself."

This comment was particularly descriptive of the new Symphony director's appearance, and was heard repeated by a number during the brief intermissions between the numbers.

A striking characteristic of the new director is the very obvious consideration he gives to the members of the orchestra. To them he is particularly gracious, and yesterday, before turning to the audience to bow to the torrent of enthusiasm that was manifested, he made a quick nod and gesture of approval, accompanied by a smile, to the players, as if anxious to devise a share of the success to them.

Herr Paur will be a popular conductor as far as the orchestra is concerned. His name is calculated to win the highest respect from them. That is a very valuable point in favor of the new capellmeister.

The symphony audience want to see him with very little knowledge of his personality, with, probably, no very deep-seated impressions, and they showed him that they liked him by the prolonged applause that followed the finale of the serial numbers and by the outburst after the concluding number.

He is not at all like Nikisch, the man who for two years was the very idol of symphony attendants. He is the greatest possible antithesis to the old leader.

Where Nikisch was calm, easy, with the natural, unstudied abandon in the makeup of a thorough Bohemian, Paur is nervous, quick, constantly active, the very embodiment of energy and constantly showing the enthusiasm he is imbued with.

HERR PAUR HUSHING THE FIRST VIOLINS.

Where the former conductor was always admirably graceful, whether waving his baton or in bowing to accept his reward from the assemblage, the new director is ever possessed with the air of business and has very little of what might be called the talents and accomplishments of the social end of the leader's stand.

But when he gets thoroughly down to business he charms because of the results he obtains.

As one critic said, "He doesn't do things quite as easy as did Nikisch," and this suggests the two dominating characteristics of the personality of the two men.

Nikisch was magnetic.

Paur is energetic.

Both men are excellent examples of their class.

It is just 2.33 p.m., three minutes past the usual hour for the commencement of the rehearsal, and the hall is crowded, with everybody on the edge of their seat waiting for the appearance of the new leader.

Soon the head of the symphony librarian

HERR PAUR APPEALING TO THE BASSER.

appears at the entrance to the left of the stage as he reconnoiters, and everybody knows that Herr Paur is to follow.

So he does, but he walks across the front so quickly, as if in a hurry to get to his place, that he has reached the small, red-carpeted conductor's stand before the audience really have time to arrive at the fortissimo of enthusiasm.

Herr Paur steps upon the stand, turns to the house and bows three times at the greeting.

At the outset the new director sets his auditors a talking. His bow is a unique one.

Placing both feet near together his head goes down suddenly and does not stop until his body and limbs are almost at right angles, and then he places his left hand into his long hair over his ear and hangs on to it while he executes a few short, quick bows with his head without straightening up.

The Paur bow is destined to be a distinctive feature in the conversation about the director personally.

Herr Paur wears a black frock coat, which is unbuttoned, but does not open enough to show his vest, and his trousers are of dark striped material.

His long, sandy hair is parted in the middle, but unlike most hirsute growths of the character it does not fly about as he exerts himself. No matter how Herr Paur waves his arms and shakes his head that hair never moves a particle.

The conductor stands nervously rubbing his beard about his mouth and looking over the house for the few moments that precede the opening chords of the first number.

He turns toward the orchestra, gives his baton a short, sharp wave, and the rehearsal has commenced.

It is in the first few moments that the audience sees the remarkable distinctiveness of Paur's manner of conducting.

He uses his whole body.

With the small baton in the right hand he directs with precise, incisive strokes as he moves his arm about, running from the second violins on his right through basses, reeds and brasses to the first violins on his left.

Then his left hand comes into play as he gesticulates to the players on his left, and soon his head is nodding vigorously, as with his body bent over he is looking straight at the big fiddlers and brass instrumentalists.

In a brilliant fortissimo passage with head and arms going, his right foot moves pat, pat, accenting the notes, and as the sound becomes louder and louder and the climax approaches even his knees bend to the tempo of the melody.

The climax of the passage is reached and with it the director's two hands go up over his head; he straightens up and then executes one grand downward stroke, brings both arms down vigorously and throws his head forward. The climax is passed and the orchestra must recede.

During those periods of activity the director is all expression and even makes a gesture to the orchestra in the quick snap of the left hand that turns the sheets of the conductor's score. Sometimes he forgets to turn them in the excitement of a brilliant passage, and you will see him whisk two or three pages at once. The several times he did this during the first number rather surprised some of the auditors.

HERR PAUR'S BOW IS DISTINCTIVE.

He resumes his manner of incisive strokes and soon he wants to bring the orchestra down to a pianissimo.

He extends his baton right over the music stand, and gently tips the end of the white stick; his left hand is raised up to his face, and as he bends his head over just wiggles the little finger of his left hand to the first violins. He seems to be whispering to the band.

As the music becomes softer and still more softly the body of the musician is inclined more and more, and as the fingers grip the baton loosely every part of his body expresses the restraint he wishes to impress upon the players.

Truly Herr Paur is a man of remarkably expressive contrasts.

He is surely a pantomimist of no meager talent.

His favorite move seemed to be, however, the short, quick downward and upward stroke of the baton, and only when reaching the climaxes did he use the full downward swing of the arm.

For first-class animation, however, there is nothing like the new capellmeister when he is directing an accelerando movement.

His head is bowed toward them. He swings it around from the extreme second violinist to the concert master, then quickly raises it and the baton goes in short jerks as the orchestra increases the volume of tone.

As if urging them on the director keeps thrashing his little stick about, gradually raising his arm. The other hand is going in the same jerky fashion, his head is bobbing from side to side, until you think he is going to strain his neck.

The left hand shoots out at arm's length, and with the fist clenched he vigorously signals for the bass players to give out the fullest tones.

It is in these movements that one recollects the soft, easy ways of Nikisch and contrasts them with the energy and animation of his successor to the detriment, however, of neither.

Paur bends himself to the softer portions of the movements but straightens and strains as the demand upon his men becomes more and the sound broadens.

He is a pour in both extremes.

Only once did he use Nikisch's favorite broad, almost horizontal swing of the baton, and this was in a waltz movement in the second number on the program. Here he swung the stick over the top of his music stand and waved his left hand lightly, but even in this quiet motion there was the energy when he reversed the motion.

Capellmeister Paur demonstrates to the audience that he has his eye and ear applied to every member of the orchestra, for he keeps continually moving his eyes all over the body of men. At one time the work of a second violinist annoyed him for a second and he quickly bent over toward him. Several times other members felt this little reprimand in a glance and fixed their eyes closer on the music.

Herr Paur tells his men forcibly from the directing stand what to do, as was shown in the last number where a triangle, cymbals and tambourine came in in one passage. The three men were sitting down at the back of the stage, when the director nodded for them to get up, and, extending both hands out until they met, indicated in this way every clash he wished from that trio.

Herr Paur has one little eccentricity that the audience doesn't see.

He has a habit when raising his head toward the players of opening his mouth and eyes wide and as he swings his head and slowly lowers it, the eyes and mouth close.

The director is nervous and awkward during the intermissions, and stands up fingering his baton and looking over the hall. He had to repeat his eccentric bow several times at every interlude.

As he stepped down at the close of the last number and bowed once to the applause, he went quickly to Mr. Kneisel, the concert master, warmly shook his hand, and rushed quickly for the refuge of the retiring room. He had to come out again and respond to the plaudits.

Of the many expressions regarding the new conductor heard after the rehearsal the predominating one was that Herr Paur was energetic, precise and inspiring.

The announcement of the beginning of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a welcome one, from the fact that at one time it looked as though there would not be one. "Blessings brighten as they take their flight," and we are to be congratulated that the danger of losing this organization has caused us all to realize its brightness in time to prevent it from soaring to other skies. Nothing has so emphasized the real interest in music in Boston as this event of the summer just passed.

SYMPHONIES BEGIN.

First Public Appearance of Conductor Paur.

A man, wholly without that nameless "Je ne sais pas quoi," understood to distinguish the aristocracy of blood, an honest Saxon face, full bearded, with mild blue eyes, framed by a shock of fluffy, light-colored hair, worn in mild profusion, black frock coat and light trousers hanging carelessly upon the tall, loosely-jointed figure—such is Emil Paur as he appeared yesterday afternoon at the first rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra.

And what an audience had gathered to greet him!

Over floor and gallery the eye roamed in vain, seeking an empty seat; from each open door on the floor peered a crowd of delighted faces.

All society was present, nodding and smiling to its friends in the intervals between the music, hushed and silent for once during the perfect harmonies produced by the matchless orchestra.

Promptly at 2:30 Mr. Paur takes his stand in front of the orchestra. The audience is prepared to criticize. Franz Kneisel has many friends in its ranks, but note—as the grand strains of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony float out over their heads, the awkward form before them seems to expand, the mild blue eyes dilate, and the mouth closes firmly over the white teeth, the hair is tossed back from the forehead—the shoulders are thrown back—it is another and widely different man who stands before them. One forgets the ill-fitting garments as the form within instinctively assumes attitudes of grace. Note how he bends first this way and then the other, now beckoning a musician in the rear who may be almost infinitesimally at fault, but whom the perfect ear of the master has detected and chided; now waving his hands slowly over a perfectly rendered "andante" passage, and anon, with quickened time and beat, hurrying on an "allegro," identifying himself completely with the composer.

The vast audience is still as death—a flush comes and goes in the cheeks of the women—some of the men instinctively gnaw their finger nails, while others are as still and motionless as if spell-bound; when the music ceases, a great sigh, as if forced from the lips of a struggling giant, goes up from the listeners, silence again for a moment—and then—a perfect storm of hand clapping and exclamations of delight; whilst, after gravely bowing to his orchestra, the master turns slowly around and bows thrice to his audience, the long hair falling over and almost concealing his face.

When he lifts his head, the inspiration has departed from it. Once more he is the plain, kindly-faced German.

Such is Emil Paur.

REHEARSAL GIRLS.

How They Crowded Music Hall Yesterday.

"Perfectly Lovely" and "Decision Reserved" The Verdict.

Musicians Also Give the Journal Their Opinion of Mr. Paur.

The symphonies began yesterday. The fashionable "rehearsal"—which is not a rehearsal at all, by the way, but which is quite as much a "concert" as is the Saturday night performance designated by that title—attracted the usual flock of stylishly attired Back Bay maidens, with their stately chaperones and an infinitesimal sprinkling of men. Yesterday it seemed as though the proportion between the sexes was even more askew than on previous years, for, to a Journal man who watched the outflowing stream at the close of the performance, there seemed to be at least 50 women to every man.

But it was a crush. The "symphony girls" were dying to see Mr. Paur, the new conductor, and to compare him with the departed Nikisch.

They have not quite decided whether he is more delightful or not. It is an open question. Do the broad shoulders and the mass of blonde hair and beard atone for the lithe figure of the Hungarian and that carefully trained wisp of hair which used to descend over his brow? So they content themselves with the non-committal assurance that he is "perfectly lovely," and "decision is reserved," as the judges say in court when they cannot decide.

THE MUSICAL SEASON of Boston for 1893-4 is now fairly started, and will soon be in full swing. Then there will be offered to music lovers a continuous stream of good things, and each may choose that which seems best for him. In some instances he will get what he desires, and in others not, unless he is a Croesus. I am thinking of the Symphony concerts and the opera season. The conductor of the former has arrived, and already the speculators are sending out diagrams of Music Hall, and suggesting that they would be "pleased to secure your tickets for you," and that it might be wise to mark more than one location in which you would be willing to sit for the season, so I presume the fashionable people will, as usual, occupy the seats at the concerts, and the students and musical people generally will stand or cling at such uncertain anchorage as offers in the way of stairs, etc.

LEADING SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYERS.
Franz Kneisel, T. Adamowski, Alvin Schroeder, Arnold Moldauer, Max Zach, L. Sycenski.

THE NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR

aug 29 1893
Herr Emil Paur Pleased at His Coming to Boston.

Mr. Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, writes from a famous watering-place in Ger-much satisfac- to take the a; and I ai- to all of the ress for the ne while yet h have been ily attitude. earn, from all t your city, e a taste for show judi- ng real art

Symphony are properly d to be low- trivial com-been given whose cour- ly classical s not been Berlin or nen by the for New t probably begins his predecessor Mr. Nikisch ng Leipsic ll-humored l, whom. It sch not to tics of the e a set of ther indis- viewed by on papers, interviewer what the g his con- opinions of lital music honorable pronoun- ssfully fill he Boston sident of e recently ng-haired t of news just such habilitate Orchestra y reason ill be a Viennese we have been deceived in the reports concerning Mr. Paur's capabilities the patrons of the Symphony concerts will have occasion to rejoice that neither Weingartner, or Mottl came or as regards that matter Hans Richter either. There is but one thing to be feared in the case of Mr. Paur, and that is that he may not be catholic enough in his taste as regards the material that will be presented in his programmes. Programmes that will satisfy the critical listners of a Vienna audience, Mr. Paur will find will not be liberal enough in character to gratify the demands of an equally critical and more Catholic taste here in Boston.

It would be fatal for Mr. Paur or any other conductor here in America to so undervalue the compositions of certain French, Russian, English or Ameri- can authors that they should be ignored or seldom find a place upon the pro- grammes of the symphonic organiza- tions over which such a conductor may have arbitrary control.

This is an item that Mr. Paur should consider well, for should he prove to be the comprehensive musician that we are led to believe he is, then with this splendid orchestra at his command un- der a rigid system of discipline he can make himself famous throughout the land.

So let us rest in the hope that Mr. Higginson's munificence in the charge of the new conductor will be most judiciously employed.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

AMUSEMENTS.

Sept 30 1893
The Symphony Sale.

The sale of the seats for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts proved to be quite a satisfactory one to both the management and the buyers. To be sure prices were somewhat lower than last season, but considering the times and financial depression that exists, it must be admitted the premiums ob- tained were higher than the most san- guine could expect. It is doubtful if any musical undertaking could have commanded at auction so large an at- tendance and such high premiums as did the sale of the Symphony course.

There is one feature wherein this season's sale differs materially from that of last season, and that is the fact that the buyers all express a feeling of satisfaction with the prices paid for their seats. In other words, the public is satisfied, and as the management is also satisfied, what more equitable con- clusion could have been brought about? The speculators have been responsible, in previous seasons, for the very high prices obtained through bidding against the purchasers who came to buy for themselves. But the speculators have got badly bitten the past two seasons, and so, taking this fact and the low financial condition of the public into consideration, they brought only for "orders" intrusted to them at this sea- son's sale.

Herein the public has been the gainer. A new plan for disposal of tickets un- sold at the auction has been instituted this season, that is, the remaining tickets will not be sold as season tickets but the places will be retained and sold at each performance in its turn. That will be a great convenience, for it will enable those who cannot go consec- ively to avail themselves of the privi- lege of attending when they can. Stran- gers, also, visiting the city, can thus

J. Adamowski, Otto Roth.

OUR MILITIA.

The Last Shot Is Fired—N for Armory Practice.

Colonel W. L. Chase's Interest
Report on the Shoot.

Haversack Notes and Mess Ke
Bubblings at the Fire.

The week just closed has been a very one with the militia, but now the last shot has been fired and the last open-air drill is over. There is nothing ahead but armory practice. The most interesting thing of note is the announcement that the following have been commissioned: Lieut. Col. Charles L. D. to be Colonel, Eighth Infantry, Oct. 6, vice Mills, discharged; Eben T. Brackett to be Lieutenant Col. Eighth Infantry, from Oct. 6, vice Dodge, promoted; Capt. Edwin Wells Bailey, to be Major, Eighth Infantry, from Oct. 6, vice Copeland, discharged. The Examining Board meets on Wednesday, Oct. 25, the fourth in the month, and these Eighth Regiment officers will be called upon to face the Rubicon. Will there be other election and more politics?

STATE RIFLE SHOOT.

Interesting Report by Colonel Chase
Upon the Recent Competitive Prize Winners.

Col. William L. Chase, Inspector General of Rifle Practice, has submitted a very interesting report upon the recent State competition at Walnut Hill.

Of the State general match he says:
This match was completed just within

LEADING SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYERS.

Arnold Moldauer, Max Zach, L. Svedin Schroeder.

THE NEW SYMPHONY DIRECTOR

Herf Emil Paur Pleased at His Coming to Boston.

Mr. Emil Paur, the new conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, writes from a famous watering-place in Germany as follows:

"I am anticipating with much satisfaction my coming to Boston to take the direction of your orchestra, and I already feel deeply indebted to all of the gentlemen of your city press for the courtesy they have shown me while yet a stranger, the papers which have been sent me proving their friendly attitude.

"It is pleasant for me to learn, from all with whom I converse about your city, that the Boston people have a taste for all that is best in music and show judicious criticism in separating real art from dilettanteism.

"The programmes of your Symphony concerts indicate that they are properly so called, and are not allowed to be lowered by the introduction of trivial compositions.

"Such concerts have only been given here by Hans Von Bulow, whose courage in announcing strictly classical music in his programmes has not been fully appreciated either in Berlin or Hamburg.

"We will sail from Bremen by the steamship Aller, Sept. 19, for New York."

Conductor Paur will not probably make the mistake when he begins his duties in Boston that his predecessor did, i. e. ignore the press. Mr. Nikisch was unfortunate before leaving Leipzig in being the victim of the ill-humored advice of the late Otto Dresel, whom, it is reported, warned Mr. Nikisch not to pay any heed to the music critics of the Boston papers, "for they were a set of fools." Mr. Nikisch was further indiscreet in having his wife interviewed by a reporter of one of the Boston papers, Mrs. Nikisch informing the interviewer that her husband never read what the Boston papers said concerning his conducting, but heeded only the opinions of the New York music critics.

Mr. Paur will find the principal music critics of this city fair and honorable and fully capable of correctly pronouncing upon his ability to successfully fill the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A resident of Leipzig told the writer quite recently that Conductor Paur "was a long-haired Viennese disciplinarian," a bit of news that is at once encouraging for just such a person is needed here to rehabilitate the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra of five years ago. There is every reason to believe that Mr. Paur will be a worthy successor of the other "Viennese disciplinarian," Mr. Gericke, and unless we have been deceived in the reports concerning Mr. Paur's capabilities the patrons of the Symphony concerts will have occasion to rejoice that neither Weingartner, or Mottl came or as regards that matter Hans Richter either.

There is but one thing to be feared in the case of Mr. Paur, and that is that he may not be catholic enough in his taste as regards the material that will be presented in his programmes. Programmes that will satisfy the critical listeners of a Vienna audience, Mr. Paur will find will not be liberal enough in character to gratify the demands of an equally critical and more Catholic taste here in Boston.

It would be fatal for Mr. Paur or any other conductor here in America to so undervalue the compositions of certain French, Russian, English or American authors that they should be ignored or seldom find a place upon the programmes of the symphonic organizations over which such a conductor may have arbitrary control.

This is an item that Mr. Paur should consider well, for should he prove to be the comprehensive musician that we are led to believe he is, then with this splendid orchestra at his command under a rigid system of discipline he can make himself famous throughout the land.

So let us rest in the hope that Mr. Higginson's munificence in the charge of the new conductor will be most judiciously employed.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

AMUSEMENTS.

Sept 30 Journal 1893
The Symphony Sale.

The sale of the seats for the Symphony rehearsals and concerts proved to be quite a satisfactory one to both the management and the buyers. To be sure prices were somewhat lower than last season, but considering the times and financial depression that exists, it must be admitted the premiums obtained were higher than the most sanguine could expect. It is doubtful if any musical undertaking could have commanded at auction so large an attendance and such high premiums as did the sale of the Symphony course.

There is one feature wherein this season's sale differs materially from that of last season, and that is the fact that the buyers all express a feeling of satisfaction with the prices paid for their seats. In other words, the public is satisfied, and as the management is also satisfied, what more equitable conclusion could have been brought about? The speculators have been responsible, in previous seasons, for the very high prices obtained through bidding against the purchasers who came to buy for themselves. But the speculators have got badly bitten the past two seasons, and so, taking this fact and the low financial condition of the public into consideration, they brought only for "orders" intrusted to them at this season's sale.

Herein the public has been the gainer. A new plan for disposal of tickets unsold at the auction has been instituted this season, that is, the remaining tickets will not be sold as season tickets but the places will be retained and sold at each performance in its turn. That will be a great convenience, for it will enable those who cannot go consecutively to avail themselves of the privilege of attending when they can. Strangers, also, visiting the city, can thus satiate their desire to hear our Symphony orchestra. Of course the number of seats to be thus disposed of is limited, and it is said will be sold for $1 and $1.50, according to location, at the Music Hall box office as each performance occurs.

52

Two of our contemporaries have expressed the opinion in their columns that the probable reason for the lower prices this season existed in the fact that the public was a little uncertain concerning the new conductor and the nature of the concerts he will give.

Nothing could be more ridiculous than such a conclusion. When Mr. Gericke came here he was almost wholly unknown; so obscure was his reputation not ten people in the whole city knew anything of his ability or intentions. It was the same with Mr. Nikisch, of whom it was only known that he was an operatic conductor in Leipzig, a second-rate city in musical importance upon the continent.

As regards Mr. Paur it must be admitted our public know more of his standing than of his predecessors, both as regards his ability as a conductor and also as an eminent pianist with an enviable reputation throughout Germany. More than that, the best reports have reached us of his marked success in the half dozen or more positions he has held upon the continent, all tending to the impression that he is not only a fine musician, a strict disciplinarian and a magnetic conductor, but that he is as well a musician of broad catholic taste, unpartisan in the nationality of composers, a man of culture in the broad sense, and at the same time a genial and courteous gentleman. We have little or no reason to doubt the reliability of these favorable reports concerning Mr. Paur, hence the folly of the statements made in the columns of our contemporaries.

The expectations of the public had been raised to the highest point in the case of Mr. Nikisch, but in the opinion of those competent to judge he failed to realize a high standard of ability as a symphonic conductor. But then these expectations were raised upon no reasonable basis. In Mr. Paur's case an extended and varied experience has established for him a reputation as an able conductor of both operatic and concert performances. Let us welcome him warmly, and generously support him while he displays his capacity and shows in what degree he is competent for the position he is to assume. W.D.

HAT IS THIS! Symphony tickets not selling at such enormous premiums as formerly? I am surprised, and feel like returning to my callow days, and asking, "why?"

Have the fashionables failed to rally, or is it because they have not been "presented to the new conductor, and, really, you know, it would be such bad form," etc. It cannot be because they are unacquainted with his antecedents, for the dailies have told what I should think certainly must constitute nearly all his private affairs. At any rate, I am pleased at the result of the auction, and may the premiums grow beautifully less every year. The concerts were originated that music lovers might educate themselves by hearing good music at low prices, and that is the position to which they should return.

Life is on a visit here to write pupils of Prof. works for two pianos! Constantin Sternberg, forte has so far evue; Dr. M. Loebel, as shown in the waukee "Herald;" that he is equally able and hearty and as The Boston con- thelbert Nevin, the tly first class con- ws, the older a Pitts- t of most of the e a future rival of his me 3,000 marks ung Sittig, of Utica, rlsruhe, Munich came to me strongly d like a pike in a the Utica Conserva- endants, and yet dy here at the Hoch- elf upon the fact the very highest travel to Gotha to at-

53

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor. op. 67.

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro.
- IV. Allegro.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

SERENADE FOR STRINGS, in C major, op. 48.

- I. Pezzo in forma di sonatina. Andante non troppo. Allegro moderato.
- II. Valse. Moderato; Tempo di valse.
- III. Elegia. Larghetto elegiaco.
- IV. Finale. (Tema russo). Andante. Allegro con spirito.

WAGNER.

OVERTURE TO "TANNHAEUSER."

gratify their desire to hear our Symphony orchestra. Of course the number of seats to be thus disposed of is limited, and it is said will be sold for $1 and $1.50, according to location, at the Music Hall box office as each performance occurs.

Two of our contemporaries have expressed the opinion in their columns that the probable reason for the lower prices this season existed in the fact that the public was a little uncertain concerning the new conductor and the nature of the concerts he will give.

Nothing could be more ridiculous than such a conclusion. When Mr. Gericke came here he was almost wholly unknown; so obscure was his reputation not ten people in the whole city knew anything of his ability or intentions. It was the same with Mr. Nikisch, of whom it was only known that he was an operatic conductor in Leipzig, a second-rate city in musical importance upon the continent.

As regards Mr. Paur it must be admitted our public know more of his standing than of his predecessors, both as regards his ability as a conductor and also as an eminent pianist with an enviable reputation throughout Germany. More than that, the best reports have reached us of his marked success in the half dozen or more positions he has held upon the continent, all tending to the impression that he is not only a fine musician, a strict disciplinarian and a magnetic conductor, but that he is as well a musician of broad catholic taste, unpartisan in the nationality of composers, a man of culture in the broad sense, and at the same time a genial and courteous gentleman. We have little or no reason to doubt the reliability of these favorable reports concerning Mr. Paur, hence the folly of the statements made in the columns of our contemporaries.

The expectations of the public had been raised to the highest point in the case of Mr. Nikisch, but in the opinion of those competent to judge he failed to realize a high standard of ability as a symphonic conductor. But then these expectations were raised upon no reasonable basis. In Mr. Paur's case an extended and varied experience has established for him a reputation as an able conductor of both operatic and concert performances. Let us welcome him warmly, and generously support him while he displays his capacity and shows in what degree he is competent for the position he is to assume. W.D.

WHAT IS THIS! Symphony tickets not selling at such enormous premiums as formerly? I am surprised, and feel like returning to my cal- low days, and asking, "why?"

Have the fashionables failed to rally, or is it because they have not been "presented to the new conductor, and, really, you know, it would be such bad form," etc. It cannot be because they are unacquainted with his antecedents, for the dailies have told what I should think certainly must constitute nearly all his private affairs. At any rate, I am pleased at the result of the auction, and may the premiums grow beautifully less every year. The concerts were originated that music lovers might educate themselves by hearing good music at low prices, and that is the position to which they should return.

life is on a visit here rite pupils of Prof.
orks for two pianos!
onstantin Sternberg,
vue; Dr. M. Loebel, waukee "Herald;"
le and hearty and as thelbert Nevin, the ws, the older a Pitts-a future rival of his ung Sittig, of Utica, came to me strongly the Utica Conserva-dy here at the Hochhe very highest travel to Gotha to at-

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro.
- IV. Allegro.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

SERENADE FOR STRINGS, in C major, op. 48.

- I. Pezzo in forma di sonatina. Andante non troppo. Allegro moderato.
- II. Valse. Moderato; Tempo di valse.
- III. Elegia. Larghetto elegiaco.
- IV. Finale. (Tema russo). Andante. Allegro con spirito.

WAGNER.

OVERTURE TO "TANNHAEUSER."

52

gratify their desire to hear our symphony orchestra. Of course the number of seats to be thus disposed of is limited, and it is said will be sold for $1 and $1.50, according to location, at the Music Hall box office as each performance occurs.

Two of our contemporaries have expressed the opinion in their columns that the probable reason for the lower prices this season existed in the fact that the public was a little uncertain concerning the new conductor and the nature of the concerts he will give.

Nothing could be more ridiculous than such a conclusion. When Mr. Gericke came here he was almost wholly unknown; so obscure was his reputation not ten people in the whole city knew anything of his ability or intentions. It was the same with Mr. Nikisch, of whom it was only known that he was an operatic conductor in Leipzig, a second-rate city in musical importance upon the continent.

As regards Mr. Paur, admitted our public knows his standing than of both as regards his ability and also as an eminent and enviable reputation many. More than that have reached us of his in the half dozen or more has held upon the concert to the impression that a fine musician, a strict and a magnetic conductor, well a musician of broad unpartisan in the nation, a man of culture and at the same time a zealous gentleman. We reason to doubt the reliability of reports concerning the folly of the in the columns of our

The expectations of been raised to the high case of Mr. Nikisch, but of those competent to judge he failed to realize a high standard of ability as a symphonic conductor. But then these expectations were raised upon no reasonable basis. In Mr. Paur's case an extended and varied experience has established for him a reputation as an able conductor of both operatic and concert performances. Let us welcome him warmly, and generously support him while he displays his capacity and shows in what degree he is competent for the position he is to assume. W.D.

53

HAT IS THIS! Symphony tickets not selling at such enormous premiums as formerly? I am surprised, and feel like returning to my callow days, and asking, "why?"

Have the fashionables failed to rally, or is it because they have not been "presented to the new conductor, and, really, you know, it would be such bad form," etc. It cannot be because they are unacquainted with his antecedents, for the dailies have told what I should think certainly must constitute nearly all his private affairs. At any rate, I am pleased at the result of the auction, and may the premiums grow beautifully less every year. The concerts were originated that music lovers might educate themselves by hearing good music at low prices, and that is the position to which they should return.

The engagement of Emil Paur, of Leipzig, as successor to Nikisch, ought to meet with the approval even of the Boston critics. He is an extraordinarily fine musician and good conductor, as well as pianist. His forte has so far been the conducting of opera, but he has shown in the leading of the concerts of the Liszt Society that he is equally well at home on the concert platform. The Boston conductorship vacancy and the scarcity of really first class conductors has worked around to the benefit of most of the good ones here. They have been raised some 3,000 marks apiece all around in Berlin, Dresden, Karlsruhe, Munich and even Vienna. The Boston scare acted like a pike in a carp pond upon some of the right royal intendants, and yet Boston may be glad and congratulate herself upon the fact that she did not get one or the other of the very highest priced ones.

* * *

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Allegro.
- IV. Allegro.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

SERENADE FOR STRINGS, in C major, op. 48.

- I. Pezzo in forma di sonatina. Andante non troppo. Allegro moderato.
- II. Valse. Moderato; Tempo di valse.
- III. Elegia. Larghetto elegiaco.
- IV. Finale. (Tema russo). Andante. Allegro con spirito.

WAGNER.

OVERTURE TO "TANNHAEUSER."

PAUR'S DEBUT.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT OF THE SEASON.

Three Important Works on the Programme—

The New Conductor Creates a Favorable Impression—Not Exciting But Emphatic and Decisive—A Large Audience Present.

An auspicious beginning! It would naturally be unsafe to proceed to absolute judgment after a single performance, and that performance one which is always attended by especial difficulties and surrounded by abnormal conditions; at the outset therefore, the reviewer may beg permission to present personal impressions rather than that definite verdict which can only be attained after our new conductor has been heard in varying schools and under differing circumstances.

So much is sure, the audience was captured on Saturday, and what began as a cordial welcome ended as a furor of enthusiasm. Naturally enough one thought less of the composers on such an occasion, than of the conductor. The personality of Mr. Paur (and the name is to be pronounced just as the English word "Power") is entirely in his favor; earnestness is in every gesture, and fidelity is stamped upon the features. A thoroughly Teutonic nature, one would judge, and one which will adhere to received traditions with consistent conservatism. The performance carried out these impressions: There will not be much pepper in the broth this season; after our hasheesh a sedative will be healthy. Mr. Paur does not seem to be an exciting conductor, but his gestures are emphatic, and his beat is decisive enough.

The make-up of the first two programmes is a significant straw, and demonstrates that showiness and sensationalism are to be absent from the list. Beethoven's fifth symphony was an excellent letter of introduction, a fitting work to form the musical grace to the season. The first two movements showed something of nervousness on the part of both conductor and orchestra. The first attack of the awkward figure beginning on the arsis of the measure (the bete noir of all conductors) was a trifle ragged, and when the second theme was ushered in by the horn that instrument was played timidly, too softly, and broke besides. But the oboe deserves a word of especial mention for the exquisite shading of the cadenza in the recapitulation of the chief theme after the development: it has never been taken here at so slow a tempo, but this seemed an improvement rather than a fault.

In the second movement the pizzicato of the contrabasses was too light to balance the viola and cello theme; it would be an improvement if our orchestra had a couple of contrabasses added to its force; eight are scarcely enough to counterbalance the power of the higher strings. This second movement seemed a trifle squarecut; it was too precise and formal for an andante and the con moto was often absent.

From this time on, however, there was more of abandon, and the reading was commendable. The difficult passages for contrabasses in the trio of the scherzo were as clear as crystal, and the finale was given with brilliancy and vigor. The absence of all tendency to exaggerate was commendable.

Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings, C major, op. 48, was light and refreshing. It was a popular work which yet was far from being either sensational or trashy. The introductory theme of its first movement had a certain dignity, and was suggestive of "Ein Feste Burg." This theme was made use of in a symmetrical manner; it ended the first movement just as the horn theme which begins the great Schubert symphony (to be played next Saturday) also ends the first movement; it also appeared as a reminiscence at the end of the finale of the entire serenade. The waltz of the second movement was a pretty bit of musical confectionery, and was given a graceful reading. The Elegie had a distinct leaning towards Goldmarkian sensuousness. The theme on the first violins with pizzicato accompaniment, the duet between these and the cellos, and the passages for muted strings, all showed that we may yet be proud of our body of strings, and that we ought never to forget the conductor who first organized them. They played under difficulties at this concert, for the warmth of the night told upon the catgut, and there was an absolute hailstorm of breaking strings, and this was not confined to the violin E strings either, for even the heavy, cello strings began to break.

The finale of the pretty serenade began, as the preceding movement had ended, upon the highest positions of the violins, but soon led into a most rollicking Russian folk-dance. Such music one might hear at the Possidelotschni, the jolly winter gatherings of the peasantry, when the men join in the wild Kamarinskaia, or all hands unite in the hearty folk-song. There was some graceful counterpoint in this movement, chiefly in a florid bass part. Portions of this finale distinctly recalled a theme of the finale of the Fifth symphony which had preceded. The concert ended with the "Tannhaeuser" overture. This was taken with considerable deliberation at first, and one missed the spice which legitimately belongs to the Venus music, but from the final entrance of the Pilgrim Chorus all went brilliantly, and one heard with satisfaction that our conductor was not likely to over-refine fiery works by suppressing the brasses.

A very large audience was present and the applause was liberal, culminating, as already indicated, in many recalls at the close of the concert. A conductor's post in Boston is not a bed of roses, and it is therefore most gratifying that Mr. Paur has been so fortunate in at once winning popular suffrages.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Some Other Views.

H. E. Krehbiel of the N. Y. Tribune, regarding the first appearance of Herr Paur as conductor of the Symphony orchestra, writes: "He did not strive to impress any novel conception on the C minor symphony. He did mar its beauty, but it was not through any wish to inject into it things that never entered Beethoven's mind. He hurt it by exaggerated emphasis and a detached style of performance, which we have observed as an outgrowth of the Bayreuth influence." Regarding the Tannhauser overture: "It was extremely lurid reading, very much like that to which Mr. Seidl has accustomed his audiences, but it showed a masterful hand in the development of climaxes and a superb ability to hold his forces in serried ranks on the top of a dramatic hill so long as it was necessary they should be there."

W. J. Henderson of the Times says: "Final judgment as to his ability cannot now be pronounced. But unless nervousness and anxiety wholly changed the habit of the man, it is safe to say that weight, dignity and correctness, rather than grace, poetry and passion, will prove to be the salient qualities of Emil Paur's conducting."

"These are by no means qualities to be despised. The classic writers left us a very precious legacy, which is safe from violent treatment in the hands of just such men as Paur. Perhaps the modern romanticists may not seem to be quite so romantic under his bat, but that remains to be proved. From his first concert one would naturally expect to find that his most admirable achievement would prove to be the explanation of a Bach fugue."

One Impression of Paur.

Emil Paur, the new director of the Symphony Orchestra, is likely to be popular. In any event, people are studying him now with interest because of his rather unique appearance and unconventional personality.

His bow to the symphony audience is a unique one. Putting his feet near together his head goes down suddenly and he does not stop until his body and limbs are almost at right angles. His left hand goes into his long hair and hangs on to it.

His long, sandy hair is parted in the middle, but does not fly about as he exerts himself. It never moves.

"He is not at all like Nikisch. He uses his whole body. His baton in the right hand he directs with precise, incisive strokes."

In a fortissimo passage with head and arms going, his right foot moves pat, pat, accenting the notes, and as the sound becomes louder and louder and the climax approaches even his knees bend to the tempo of the melody.

He resumes his incisive strokes as he wants to bring the orchestra down to a pianissimo.

Truly Herr Paur is a man of remarkably expressive contrasts.

He is a pantomimist of no meagre talent.

Paur demonstrates to the audience that he has his eye and ear applied to every member of the orchestra, for he keeps continually moving his eyes all over the body of men.

Herr Paur has one little eccentricity that the audience does not see. He has a habit when raising his head toward the players of opening his mouth and eyes wide and as he swings his head and slowly lowers it, the eyes and mouth close.

How the Orchestra Played Under New Leadership.

Critical Review of Programme and Director.

An Admirable Disciplinarian is Mr. Paur.

Mr. Emil Paur came to us from Leipzig; but let no one be prejudiced against him on this account. He was neither born nor educated in Leipzig; he only tarried there for a season.

Whatever Leipzig may have been before 1860 or even 1870, there is no denying the fact that the Leipzig of to-day is musically a barren place. What great wandering virtuoso, or fixed artist, or composer of originality has Leipzig sent forth during the last ten or twenty years?

There are professors and chapel-masters there, and galore. There is the ancient Reincke, the echo of Mendelssohn, the spinner of endless cadenzas, who has just adapted scenes from the Bible for the use of piano-players. There are such men as Salomon Jadassohn, whose music sounds a good deal like the name of the composer. But of what influence to-day is Leipzig in the great kingdom of music? Ichabod, Ichabod, the glory is departed.

As long ago as 1877 Listz said to Borodine, who mentioned a pianist as a graduate of the Leipzig Conservatory, "That's no recommendation. They have turned out there a pile of mediocrities."

We all know by hearsay and some know by actual experience, that Mr. Paur was respected and admired as a musician in the cities which he has honored by his presence. Let us start right, Mr. Paur is not worthy of our serious attention simply because Leipzig patted him on the head. He, on the contrary, contributed largely to the musical fame of a town, that, living chiefly on its past reputation, needs such props.

Since Mr. Paur's arrival here his conduct has been judicious. On divers occasions he was examined thoroughly by newspaper men, and his conversation, as recorded, was modest, frank, sensible, to the point.

It is said that he has been diligent in rehearsal. He has not used the time of the players in reading his private correspondence of merely friendly or inflammatory nature. He has worked with the orchestra, and he knew when he entered the hall what he was about to demand of his men.

This is proper and becoming. Mr. Paur is hired for this purpose, and the players are hired to obey the conductor.

Nor were some of these players imported solely for their social qualifications, as would appear by their behavior during the last three years.

There was curiosity to see the man at the head of his forces. How many of those who attended the concert last evening cared one straw about the programme, whether the numbers were by Beethoven or by Bulsenheimer. There was a desire to see the man himself, so that there could be talk about his hair, his hands, the movements of his arms, his costume and any personal mannerisms.

EMIL PAUR.

This admiration of individuality and this curiosity concerning personality retard undoubtedly the healthy growth of music and tend to stifle honest criticism. The talk is of the conductor, not of the orchestra; of the conductor, not of the music, which it is his duty and privilege to study reverently.

If the conductor were unseen by the audience, would there be as great a demand for admission?

And yet, men and brethren, the one great absorbing question should not be, does Mr. Paur like oysters, or does he believe in the Jaeger system of underwear, or is Mrs. Paur a charming woman, or would the couple shine at an afternoon tea; — the one great absorbing question is this: Is Mr. Paur thoroughly qualified for the performance of his task.

Then comes this question: When Mr. Paur conducts, are his heart and soul the servants of the composer, or do they work merely for Mr. Paur's glorification?

Mr. Paur had prepared us by his own words to think favorably of certain of his artistic theories and beliefs. Before the concert he said publicly: "I cannot sympathize with Wagner in his wish to invest some of Beethoven's compositions with scenic suggestions and dramatic developments which need other than musical terms of expression."

And in speaking of the "enormous freedoms" of von Bülow, Mr. Paur said, "That does not mean that I think the Beethoven symphonies ought to be rattled off as if by a barrel organ. No, but I believe that Beethoven's ideas, if properly presented, are sufficiently characteristic of themselves without being colored especially for the occasion."

So it does not seem that Mr. Paur intends to raise himself by trampling down and standing on Beethoven.

Then, again, Mr. Paur spoke sensibly about the introduction of soloists. In an interview published in the Journal of Sept. 29th, the new conductor said: "I shall put on only soloists that are really soloists. * * * They must be capable. The soloists must be classical, too, you know. I do not believe in putting before the public small stuff, not at all."

It must be confessed that our Symphony seasons of late were not wholly free from "small stuff." Singers so worn out, so tired that they could not raise their tones to the true pitch, nevertheless found favor with Mr. Nikisch. Pianists appeared who did not give sufficient reason for their engagement. Then there was that long line of orchestral players, some admirable and others amiable, each armed with a concerto—a line that stretched out "to the crack of doom." And there was legitimate surprise expressed at the omission of a trombone solo, say, the well-known arrangement of "The Fear," and the non-performance by our implacable drummer of Julius Tausch's Solo for Six Kettle Drums.

Now it is true that there is often a wide difference between theories and deeds. To take a snap-shot judgment of the first performance of a conductor might be, in all probability would be, unfair, and the judgment would not be surely permanent. On the one hand, there is the comparative unfamiliarity with the players; there is the natural nervousness of a man in a strange place. On the other hand, there is always a possibility that the conductor may not fulfill the promise of a first performance. The flattery of the thoughtless and the ignorant may turn his head. Social attentions may divert him from his duty. He may grow lazy. It is much fairer to conductor and to audience to judge him after the twelfth performance instead of after the first.

But our American public is in a hurry: it can not wait; and so, as before, it is not unlikely that there will be a "grand symposium," in which musicians of high and low degree will, by editorial request, indulge in printed eulogy. Let us hope that there will not in future be a repetition of the thoughtlessness or the ingratitude of Mr. Nikisch, who, even within the following year, contradicted those good reports by his own conduct, and so irritated some of his former eulogists that they were ready to insert a knife under his fifth rib.

The programme chosen by Mr. Paur for his first appearance was as follows:

Symphony, C minor, No. 5..... Beethoven
Serenade for string orchestra, op. 48..... Tchaikowsky
Overture, "Tannhauser"..... Wagner

The serenade by Tchaikowsky was first given in this city, or at least at the Symphony concerts, by Mr. Gericke Oct. 13, 1888, at the first concert of the season. The fifth Symphony of Beethoven was on the programme of the first concert of the season of '92-93. At this last concert there was no soloist. At the concert under Mr. Gericke songs were sung by Mrs. Julie Moran-Wyman, for Mrs. Wyman used to "hyphenate" her name.

Surely the programme itself does not call for extended discussion. The serenade by Tchaikowsky is a singularly eclectic composition, with its German introduction dashed with a hint at Russia; with its German waltz freshened with French grace; with its elegy in doleful Russian dumps, where the mourner suddenly betinks himself of an Italian tune; with its Russian finale where the tails of the horses are over the dashboard and the passengers smell of vodka. The trivial is side by side with the beautiful; strength shakes hands with weakness. But the interest is maintained steadily, except in the Elegy, where the grief of the mourner is so spun out that there are doubts of its sincerity.

And now let us record impressions of Mr. Paur.

58
The man's personality asserts one of his earnestness and vitality. Here is no manicured, perfumed darling of Temple Place. This man regards the orchestra and the music rather than the audience. He does not remember to be graceful in action.

He is sometimes violent, sometimes almost grotesque.

At one time he chops wood; at another he says to a child, "Come now, play do-do."

He is angular, even triangular.

But he is terribly in earnest.

The audience might well have thought of the line of Walt Whitman: "Pleased with the earnest words of the sweating Methodist preacher."

For Mr. Paur gave physical manifestations of his conviction and his desire to do his duty, though the hall should prove to be a stoke-hole.

Mr. Paur's beat is decisive, if it is not elegant; and decision is better than careless grace. He was diligent in giving the cue, and there could be no mistake as to the direction.

He has a keen sense of the value of drawing. His draught is clear and firm. About his sense of color, I am not so sure.

He knows the value of dynamic gradations, and he can compel his wish to be performed and to become a fact. Although the playing of orchestra last evening was of uneven worth, he showed that he could work the crescendo pedal, to borrow a phrase from the organ-builder, and there were niceties in expression that have not been heard here since the departure of Mr. Gericke.

Every move had evidently been carefully studied, and if his hand was sometimes unsteady in moving a piece upon the board, it arose from apparent nervousness at the start, and not from ignorance of intention.

Last evening Mr. Paur appeared chiefly as a thoroughly equipped schoolmaster, a rigid disciplinarian.

The love for finish in detail gave at times a movement, particularly in the Symphony, the appearance of Mosaic. A movement became then a collection of episodes rather than a burst of long breath.

And why did Mr. Paur take the andante con moto of Beethoven at so slow a pace? The melos suffered thereby. The beauty, the strange beauty of the music became monotonous.

Has Mr. Paur temperament? Has he magnetism? Has he the imagination, the noble rage of the poet?

Time must answer these questions.

Last evening it was rather the admirable schoolmaster than the man of imagination who dominates the audience by some mysterious quality, call it what you will.

And yet how sadly this very schoolmaster was needed in Boston?

Perhaps it is a good sign that Mr. Paur last evening did not give any exhibition of volcanic, Vesuvian emotion.

Let us wait until Mr. Paur has made the orchestra that still remembers another his own. Let us wait until he realizes thoroughly that he is no longer a stranger, that he is at home and among friends, who will hold up his hands in every honest endeavor to cultivate that which is good and honest and noble in music.

The hall was crowded, and the applause was evidently as sincere as it was frequent, loud and long continued.

The programme of the concert next Saturday evening will include Volkmann's overture, "Richard III.," Dvorak's Rhapsodie No. 2, and Schubert's C major symphony. Mrs. Nordica will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC. Sante

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts began last night. The programme was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; the Serenade for strings in C, op. 48, by Tschalkowsky; and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. There was an enormous audience, and the new conductor, Herr Emil Paur, was accorded a reception of the most cordial nature, and through the evening the hearty applause bestowed on him must have convinced him that his public was animated by the most friendly sentiments toward him. He has an interesting presence, and appears to be without any of the affectations that were often so unpleasantly manifested by his immediate predecessor. His beat is decisive, and he holds his orchestra well in hand. Vigor is one of the striking characteristics of his conducting, and he excites at once the conviction that he has an artistic temperament, and is thoroughly absorbed in his work. Much might be said of his reading of the symphony, and even of his interpretation of the overture, but, all things considered, we deem it both just and advisable to defer any extended criticism of his method of conducting or to express judgment upon it until we have had further experience of it. His surroundings are as yet, new to him; the orchestra has been under his control for a very brief time, and it would be wiser, therefore, to wait until he has had an opportunity to get over the inevitable anxiety and nervousness attendant on the outset of his assumption of an exacting position, and has had time to become more at his ease. It is impossible that he should, as yet, have been able to establish a complete understanding between himself and his players regarding his views; and, besides, the situation bears as hard on the orchestra as it does on their director. It is a very easy matter, under the circumstances, to do both an injustice, and hence our preference for a more complete and more satisfying experience of Mr. Paur as a conductor before venturing on an estimate of him on a first hearing. He made a very favorable impression, if the spirited approval of his efforts, given by the large and critical assemblage, may be taken as evidence. The programme, as will be seen, contained nothing that is not very familiar to the Symphony Concert audiences, and therefore, afforded ample chance to compare his methods with those who have previously wielded the baton over the orchestra; and we may add, without breach of our resolve to forego criticism, that his readings of the symphony and of the overture, brought forward much that was novel—at least, here. The selections for the next concert are: Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; Rhapsodie No. 2, Dvorak; and Symphony C, Schubert. Mme. Lillian Nordica will be the soloist.

...The Symphony Concert programme book speaks of the waltz movement in Tschalkowsky's suite for strings as having something of the Spanish character. Of course it has. The initial phrase runs note for note with that of Queen Isabella's song in "1492"—"I'm in love with the man in the moon."

AT THE FIRST SYMPHONY.

Who Were There and How They Enjoyed It.

A Notable Audience Completely Filling Music Hall.

Everybody Was There but Mrs. John L. Gardner.

It was shortly after 7.30 that the fashionable crowd began to gather in Music Hall for the opening event of the season, and the appearance of the new Symphony Orchestra conductor, Herr Paur.

As usual, it was a sober audience. Boston takes itself very seriously when the Symphony Orchestra is in question, and there is very little small talk. In fact, people seemed to rush into the corridor, push through the doors and hurry to their seats as they never do anywhere else.

Inside the hall the very first look at the platform impressed one with a difference. The double-decked stand for the conductor had disappeared. The small two by one block, of soap box reminiscence, which, during the regime of the last conductor had been added to the regular stand to give additional inches to Mr. Nikisch when he faced the orchestra, is a thing of history. In its place was a broad, low stand of generous proportions, neatly carpeted with red, and the bit of color was a great improvement to the bare stage. On it the green-twined music stand, with its beribboned rosette of chrysanthemums, did not look as it usually does—out of place.

The orchestra men were eyed with less curiosity than usual. Everyone awaited—Paur. It was past eight when he appeared at the left of the stage, mounted the steps and stirred for his post. At first sight he is far from graceful. His trunk is long for his legs and his gait is nervous and awkward. No fault could, however, be found with his attire. His clothes fitted him as well as evening dress ever fits the loose jointed German figure. His linen was immaculate, and a handkerchief peeped properly from his waistcoat. His auburn mane, devoid of anything so conventional as a parting, was pushed back from his face, and his tawny beard was neatly trimmed.

In appearance he suggested Neuendorff more than anyone else who has conducted here.

The applause which greeted him was cordial

59
but well controlled; it was warm enough, but it was not excited, and it was evident at once that he was a man who knew none, or, at least, employed none of the tricks for working up applause; for, having brushed back his hair, which his vigorous bowing in response to his reception had tumbled into his eyes, he pitched into his work with vigor.

His left hand is not the left hand of Gericke, cold, depressing, tyrannical; nor is it the left hand of Nikisch, pallid, effeminate, devitalized. In truth, it is not a pretty left hand. It is big, inclined to be ruddy, and not real becoming to a well-laundered shirt cuff. But its mannerism are likely to be as famous as were those of its predecessors. Its most notable peculiarity is a sort of "hu-h-a-bye-baby" act that is very peculiar, but very suggestive.

There is something honest and unaffected about the man, and, when he is quite used to Boston, no doubt he will boldly fetch out from his coat tail pocket that extra handkerchief for which he fished between each movement of the symphony last night and did not display at all, although his brow sadly needed mopping—a mopping which Boston, when he knows it better, will often see administered, and why not?

Many prominent people were absent last evening, but the gathering was a brilliant one.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson and his wife occupied their usual seats on the floor.

Near them sat Dr. John Wheelock Elliot and his wife of Marlboro Street and Dr. H. H. A. Beach and Mrs. Beach, the composer, with her hair pushed back from the face in which some one has discovered a resemblance to Beethoven, and wearing, as usual, a simple dark gown. In fact, there was no dressing in the audience, the absence of a few bonnets being the only festive thing in the attire of the women.

Author Howard Pickering has deserted his seat right under the conductor's stand for one further on the side.

Dr. Hamilton Osgood, who is destined to be known as the father of Mrs. Fiske Warren, was accompanied by his younger daughter; almost as pretty as her older sister.

Professor Whitney of Harvard College, who for so many years has sat, score in hand, just over the clock, was one of the first to take his seat in the balcony. Mr. John Pickering Lyman sat near him.

Of course the musical fraternity was well represented. Among those present were: Mr. and Mrs. E. A. McDowell, who have recently come to town; Mr. Ethelbert Nevin, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Ernest Perato, Mr. S. B. Whitney, Miss Gertrude Edmonds, J. D. C. Parker, Mr. W. L. Parker, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. and Mrs. William French, Mr. E. B. Hayes, B. J. Lang, Warren Davenport.

The library set was equally well represented. Mr. J. Russell Sullivan sat in front of the first balcony. Mr. Arlo Bates was there with his new honors sitting easily upon him; Mr. W. H. Ridinger was accompanied by Mrs. Ridinger; Richard Henry Dana and Theodore Dwight, the new librarian were noted on the floor.

Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, her son Barton Jenks and his wife, who was pretty Agnes Acres, a sister of Miriam O'Leary, and a bride of last season, were present.

Dr. Inches was accompanied by Mrs. Inches.

The man's personality assures one of his earnestness and virility.

Here is no manicured, perfumed darling of Temple Place.

This man regards the orchestra and the music rather than the audience.

He does not remember to be graceful in action.

He is sometimes violent, sometimes almost grotesque.

At one time he chops wood; at another he says to a child, "Come now, play do-do."

He is angular, even triangular.

But he is terribly in earnest.

The audience might well have thought of the line of Walt Whitman: "Pleased with the earnest words of the sweating Methodist preacher."

For Mr. Paur gave physical manifestations of his conviction and his desire to do his duty, though the hall should prove to be a stoke-hole.

Mr. Paur's beat is decisive, if it is not elegant; and decision is better than careless grace. He was diligent in giving the cue, and there could be no mistake as to the direction.

He has a keen sense of the value of drawing. His draught is clear and firm. About his sense of color, I am not so sure.

He knows the value of dynamic gradations, and he can compel his wish to be performed and to become a fact. Although the playing of orchestra last evening was of uneven worth, he showed that he could work the crescendo pedal, to borrow a phrase from the organ-builder, and there were niceties in expression that have not been heard here since the departure of Mr. Gericke.

Every move had evidently been carefully studied, and if his hand was sometimes unsteady in moving a piece upon the board, it arose from apparent nervousness at the start, and not from ignorance of intention.

Last evening Mr. Paur appeared chiefly as a thoroughly equipped schoolmaster, a rigid disciplinarian.

The love for finish in detail gave at times a movement, particularly in the Symphony, the appearance of Mosaic. A movement became then a collection of episodes rather than a burst of long breath.

And why did Mr. Paur take the andante con moto of Beethoven at so slow a pace? The melos suffered thereby. The beauty, the strange beauty of the music became monotonous.

Has Mr. Paur temperament? Has he magnetism? Has he the imagination, the noble rage of the poet?

Time must answer these questions.

Last evening it was rather the admirable schoolmaster than the man of imagination who dominates the audience by some mysterious quality, call it what you will.

And yet how sadly this very schoolmaster was needed in Boston?

Perhaps it is a good sign that Mr. Paur last evening did not give any exhibition of volcanic, Vesuvian Emotion.

Let us wait until Mr. Paur has made the orchestra that still remembers another his own. Let us wait until he realizes thoroughly that he is no longer a stranger, that he is at home and among friends, who will hold up his hands in every honest endeavor to cultivate that which is good and honest and noble in music.

The hall was crowded, and the applause was evidently as sincere as it was frequent, loud and long continued.

The programme of the concert next Saturday evening will include Volkmann's overture, "Richard III.;" Dvorak's Rhapsodie No. 2, and Schubert's C major symphony. Mrs. Nordica will sing.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSIC. Sarett

The Symphony Concert.

The twelfth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts began last night. The programme was Beethoven's Symphony in C minor; the Serenade for strings in C, op. 48, by Tschalkowsky; and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" overture. There was an enormous audience, and the new conductor, Herr Emil Paur, was accorded a reception of the most cordial nature, and through the evening the hearty applause bestowed on him must have convinced him that his public was animated by the most friendly sentiments toward him. He has an interesting presence, and appears to be without any of the affectations that were often so unpleasantly manifested by his immediate predecessor. His beat is decisive, and he holds his orchestra well in hand. Vigor is one of the striking characteristics of his conducting, and he excites at once the conviction that he has an artistic temperament, and is thoroughly absorbed in his work. Much might be said of his reading of the symphony, and even of his interpretation of the overture, but, all things considered, we deem it both just and advisable to defer any extended criticism of his method of conducting or to express judgment upon it until we have had further experience of it. His surroundings are as yet, new to him; the orchestra has been under his control for a very brief time, and it would be wiser, therefore, to wait until he has had an opportunity to get over the inevitable anxiety and nervousness attendant on the outset of his assumption of an exacting position, and has had time to become more at his ease. It is impossible that he should, as yet, have been able to establish a complete understanding between himself and his players regarding his views; and, besides, the situation bears as hard on the orchestra as it does on their director. It is a very easy matter, under the circumstances, to do both an injustice, and hence our preference for a more complete and more satisfying experience of Mr. Paur as a conductor before venturing on an estimate of him on a first hearing. He made a very favorable impression, if the spirited approval of his efforts, given by the large and critical assemblage, may be taken as evidence. The programme, as will be seen, contained nothing that is not very familiar to the Symphony Concert audiences, and therefore, afforded ample chance to compare his methods with those who have previously wielded the baton over the orchestra; and we may add, without breach of our resolve to forego criticism, that his readings of the symphony and of the overture, brought forward much that was novel—at least, here. The selections for the next concert are: Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; Rhapsodie No. 2, Dvorak; and Symphony C, Schubert. Mme. Lillian Nordica will be the soloist.

...The Symphony Concert programme book speaks of the waltz movement in Tschalkowsky's suite for strings as having something of the Spanish character. Of course it has. The initial phrase runs note for note with that of Queen Isabella's song in "1492"—"I'm in love with the man in the moon."

AT THE FIRST SYMPHONY.

Journal

Who Were There and How They Enjoyed It.

A Notable Audience Completely Filling Music Hall.

Everybody Was There but Mrs. John L. Gardner.

It was shortly after 7.30 that the fashionable crowd began to gather in Music Hall for the opening event of the season, and the appearance of the new Symphony Orchestra conductor, Herr Paur.

As usual, it was a sober audience. Boston takes itself very seriously when the Symphony Orchestra is in question, and there is very little small talk. In fact, people seemed to rush into the corridor, push through the doors and hurry to their seats as they never do anywhere else.

Inside the hall the very first look at the platform impressed one with a difference. The double-decked stand for the conductor had disappeared. The small two by one block, of soap box reminiscence, which, during the regime of the last conductor had been added to the regular stand to give additional inches to Mr. Nikisch when he faced the orchestra, is a thing of history. In its place was a broad, low stand of generous proportions, neatly carpeted with red, and the bit of color was a great improvement to the bare stage. On it the green-twined music stand, with its beribboned rosette of chrysanthemums did not look as it usually does—out of place.

The orchestra men were eyed with less curiosity than usual. Everyone awaited—Paur. It was past eight when he appeared at the left of the stage, mounted the steps and stirred for his post. At first sight he is far from graceful. His trunk is long for his legs and his gait is nervous and awkward. No fault could, however, be found with his attire. His clothes fitted him as well as evening dress ever fits the loose jointed German figure. His linen was immaculate, and a handkerchief peeped properly from his waistcoat. His auburn mane, devoid of anything so conventional as a parting, was pushed back from his face, and his tawny beard was neatly trimmed.

In appearance he suggested Neuendorff more than anyone else who has conducted here.

The applause which greeted him was cordial

but well controlled: it was warm enough, but it was not excited, and it was evident at once that he was a man who knew none, or, at least, employed none of the tricks for working up applause; for, having brushed back his hair, which his vigorous bowing in response to his reception had tumbled into his eyes, he pitched into his work with vigor.

His left hand is not the left hand of Gericke, cold, depressing, tyrannical; nor is it the left hand of Nikisch, pallid, effeminate, devitalized. In truth, it is not a pretty left hand. It is big, inclined to be ruddy, and not real becoming to a well-laundered shirt cuff. But its mannerism are likely to be as famous as were those of its predecessors. Its most notable peculiarity is a sort of "huh-a-bye-baby" act that is very peculiar, but very suggestive.

There is something honest and unaffected about the man, and, when he is quite used to Boston, no doubt he will boldly fetch out from his coat tail pocket that extra handkerchief for which he fished between each movement of the symphony last night and did not display at all, although his brow sadly needed mopping—a mopping which Boston, when he knows it better, will often see administered, and why not?

Many prominent people were absent last evening, but the gathering was a brilliant one.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson and his wife occupied their usual seats on the floor.

Near them sat Dr. John Wheelock Elliot and his wife of Marlboro Street and Dr. H. H. A. Beach and Mrs. Beach, the composer, with her hair pushed back from the face in which some one has discovered a resemblance to Beethoven, and wearing, as usual, a simple dark gown. In fact, there was no dressing in the audience, the absence of a few bonnets being the only festive thing in the attire of the women.

Arthur Howard Pickering has deserted his seat right under the conductor's stand for one further on the side.

Dr. Hamilton Osgood, who is destined to be known as the father of Mrs. Fiske Warren, was accompanied by his younger daughter; almost as pretty as her older sister.

Professor Whitney of Harvard College, who for so many years has sat, score in hand, just over the clock, was one of the first to take his seat in the balcony. Mr. John Pickering Lyman sat near him.

Of course the musical fraternity was well represented. Among those present were: Mr. and Mrs. E. A. McDowell, who have recently come to town; Mr. Ethelbert Nevin, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Ernest Perato, Mr. S. B. Whitney, Miss Gertrude Edmands, J. D. C. Parker, Mr. W. L. Parker, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mr. and Mrs. William French, Mr. E. B. Hayes, B. J. Lang, Warren Davenport.

The library set was equally well represented. Mr. J. Russell Sullivan sat in front of the first balcony. Mr. Arlo Bates was there with his new honors sitting easily upon him; Mr. W. H. Ridering was accompanied by Mrs. Ridering. Richard Henry Dana and Theodore Dwight, the new librarian were noted on the floor.

Mrs. Phoebe Jenks, her son Barton Jenks and his wife, who was pretty Agnes Acres, a sister of Miriam O'Leary, and a bride of last season, were present.

Dr. Inches was accompanied by Mrs. Inches.

who was Louise Pomeroy of Philadelphia, and has been one of the belles of the North shore this season.

In addition, if it is fair to pick out men of an audience so notable men, Dr. Clarence Alake, one of the most beloved and popular professional men in town; Dr. W. S. Bigelow, Mr. A. Brown, Mr. Warren A. Locke, Mr. Henry C. Peabody, Dr. J. L. Breck, Prof. H. E. Clifford, Mr. B. Learned Hand, Prof. James Mills Pierce, Mrs. Mary May-Winsor, Miss Florence May-Winsor, Mr. and Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Mr. Creston Clarke, Dr. Fitts, Mr. Temple Fay, Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Clement, Mrs. James Jackson, I. M. Ganzengige.

Probably Mrs. John L. Gardner was the most missed of the absentees.

ELLEN HAWKINS.

THE OPINIONS OF MUSICIANS.

The interviews with prominent musicians gathered by Journal reporters after the Symphony rehearsal, and published in the Saturday Journal, voiced the opinion of critical Boston then, and last night's favorable opinions by those present at the concert only served to emphasize the points originally published in the Journal columns.

PAUR'S DEBUT.

The Symphony Conductor Makes a Good Impression.

An auspicious beginning! It would naturally be unsafe to proceed to absolute judgment after a single performance, and that performance one which is always attended by especial difficulties and surrounded by abnormal conditions; at the outset therefore, the reviewer may beg permission to present personal impressions rather than that definite verdict which can only be attained after our new conductor has been heard in varying schools and under differing circumstances.

So much is sure, the audience was captured on Saturday, and what began as a cordial welcome ended as a furor of enthusiasm. Naturally enough one thought less of the composers on such an occasion, than of the conductor. The personality of Mr. Paur (and the name is to be pronounced just as the English word "Power") is entirely in his favor; earnestness is in every gesture, and fidelity is stamped upon the features. A thoroughly Teutonic nature, one would judge, and one which will adhere to received traditions with consistent conservatism. The performance carried out these impressions: There will not be much pepper in the broth this season; after our hashish a sedative will be healthy. Mr. Paur does not seem to be an exciting conductor, but his gestures are emphatic, and his beat is decisive enough.

The make-up of the first two programmes is a significant straw, and demonstrates that showiness and sensationalism are to be absent from the list. Beethoven's fifth symphony was an excellent letter of introduction, a fitting work to form the musical grace to the season. The first two movements showed something of nervousness on the part of both conductor and orchestra.

From this time on, however, there was more of abandon, and the reading was commendable. The difficult passages for contrabasses in the trio of the scherzo were as clear as crystal, and the finale was given with brilliancy and vigor. The absence of all tendency to exaggerate was commendable.

The first violins with pizzicato accompaniment, the duet between these and the cellos, and the passages for muted strings, all showed that we may yet be proud of our body of strings, and that we ought never to forget the conductor who first organized them. They played under difficulties at this concert, for the warmth of the night told upon the catgut, and there was an absolute hailstorm of breaking strings, and this was not confined to the violin E strings either, for even the heavy, cello strings began to break.

The finale of the pretty serenade began, as the preceding movement had ended, upon the highest positions of the violins, but soon led into a most rollicking Russian folk-dance. Such music one might hear at the Possidelotschni, the jolly winter gatherings of the peasantry, when the men join in the wild Kamarinskaja, or all hands unite in the hearty folk-song. There was some graceful counterpoint in this movement, chiefly in a florid bass part. Portions of this finale distinctly recalled a theme of the finale of the Fifth symphony which had preceded. The concert ended with the "Tannhäuser" overture. This was taken with considerable deliberation at first, and one missed the spice which legitimately belongs to the Venus music, but from the final entrance of the Pilgrim Chorus all went brilliantly, and one heard with satisfaction that our conductor was not likely to over-refine fiery works by suppressing the brasses.

A very large audience was present and the applause was liberal, culminating, as already indicated, in many recalls at the close of the concert. A conductor's post in Boston is not a bed of roses, and it is therefore most gratifying that Mr. Paur has been so fortunate in at once winning popular suffrages.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Mr. Paur's agony is over. He has been interviewed. He has gazed, probably with rage, at the counterfeit presentment of his face in the newspapers. He has been looked at thoroughly and judged by the matinee girls. He has been weighed in the balance by the solid, cultured and sombre audience of Saturday night. The critics have had their crack at him. And now all that he has to do is to go ahead, mind nobody's advice, and follow his own instincts; for he seems to be an eminently sensible man.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Emi Paur, conductor, gave the first concert of this its thirteenth, season in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 5, in C minor, opus 67.
Tchaikowsky: Serenade for strings, in C major, opus 48.

Wagner: Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Here is a case where the critic's task is either very easy or exceedingly difficult. A new conductor makes his first appearance before our public, and everyone is agog to know what everyone else has to say of him. But the opportunities for forming a judgment are too slight for anyone to be willing to formulate an opinion, even if he has partly formed one. The first concert an orchestra gives after its summer vacation is never a very good bone for critical contention; the men have not played together for at least four months, the orchestra is consequently rather rusty and needs more or less ensemble practice to bring it up to its whilom mark; we can hardly call to mind a first concert at which the performance was wholly fine. Add to this ordinary condition the extraordinary one of the orchestra's playing for the first time under a new conductor, to whose beat and methods the players are as much strangers as he to them, and it can be seen that no very distinct opinion is to be formed of the value of the results.

One or two things, to be sure, seemed pretty evident last Saturday evening: Mr. Paur appears not to belong to the class of conductors who trust (with greater or less reason) to the dramatic, or otherwise emotional, effect their personal presence and bearing may have upon an audience; he concentrates his attention upon the orchestra and upon the score before him, letting the playing tell the story of the music without any mimetic aid from himself. This is a comfort; not that we are inclined to undervalue the aid to the impressiveness of music that may come from a dramatic or otherwise expressive manner on the conductor's part—we have heard performances where the conductor's manner stood for a good deal in making the eye help out the ear—but that so many conductors employ such quasi-dramatic methods more for the sake of what is called in theatrical slang "mashing" an audience than for anything else, that an absence of all such manner or mannerism is at times grateful, as at least prima facie evidence of artistic sincerity and single-mindedness.

Another point in Mr. Paur's conducting may be brought up with tolerable certainty, even at this early stage of our acquaintance with him. Judging from the performances of the symphony and overture, one would say that he did not belong to the extreme school of modern "musical interpreters" that his sympathies are not unreservedly with those whose first—and often last—aim is to see how much effect it is possible to get out of a great composition, by hook or by crook, regardless of the general style and habitual artistic attitude of the composer. If our guess in this matter is right, we are doubly and trebly glad. The amount of "inspired rendering" that master-works have come in for lately is quite enough; it will be a comfort in future to be able to hear what the music itself sounds like, even at the expense of a superacute thrill or two. Mr. Paur, to be sure, took some passages in both symphony and overture a shade different, ly from the way we have been accustomed to hear them go; but we cannot recall an instance either of his contravening expression, marks in the score, or of his in any way overstepping the normal limits of that artistic latitude of interpretation of which most musico naturally admits. In no case did an individual reading of a passage seem to flaunt "This is Paur" in your face. We can even say that one of the "new readings"—near the close of the Andante con moto of the fifth symphony—was more nearly in accordance with plainly printed directions in the score than any playing of the passage in question we have ever heard.

Having said thus much (or little) about Mr. Paur and his conducting, we have said all we mean to this time. Except that it should go on record that he was warmly greeted by a large audience—quite unusually large for the beginning of a season—and had that applause dearest of all to an artist's heart: the kind that goes on crescendo e sempre più crescendo as number after number on the programme is finished.

Of the programme itself not much need be said; a first concert with a strange orchestra is about as awkward an occasion for the conductor, as programme-maker, as it is in other respects. Beethoven's C minor symphony and Wagner's overture to "Tannhäuser" are (be it said with all respect) old concert hacks, astride of which any orchestral player may be expected to keep his seat; they are as good as anything else to begin the season with—works of genius of which only the most jaded musical palate need ever tire. Why the Tchaikowsky serenade was given is not quite so clear; the work is not up to the dignity of a symphony concert, let alone an occasion that might be supposed to have something "inaugural" about it. The first and last movements can pass muster well enough, but the rest is cheap as may be. If the performance of this serenade was of the nature of a ceremonial call on Tchaikowsky as one of the brightest shining lights of contemporary music (to whom such ceremonial respect is in a measure due), we hope it was given last Saturday on the "do-it-now-and-have-it-over" principle.

The next programme is: Volkmann, overture to "Richard III.," aria; Dvorák, rhapsody No. 2; aria; Schubert, symphony in C major, No. 9. Mme. Nordica will be the singer.

Symphony Tickets.

HEARD'S TICKET OFFICE, 43 WEST ST. 10[A] 26

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

For sale, 3 seats for Saturday concerts, first balcony, numbers 521, 522 and 523; $18 each. Apply at Room 70, Equitable Building. 47[A] 64

TWO CONCERT SEATS

In second row of first balcony on left side facing stage, one-half way back, bought by mistake, may be secured for $21.50 each, by addressing A. W. N., Boston Transcript. 47[A] 64

THE NEW CONDUCTOR.

Herald

Oct 15/93

Emil Paur in Charge of the Symphony.

Wielded the Baton at Last Night's Concert.

Beethoven, Tschaiikowsky and Wagner Played.

The General Impression
Very Favorable.

What Musical Critics Say of the Performance.

The reassembling of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the season and the appearance of Mr. Emil Paur, the new conductor of the organization, served as attractions which called musical Boston to Music Hall last evening in such numbers that both seating and standing room was completely occupied.

It is a source of pleasure to say at once that the most sanguine hopes regarding the new incumbent of the position of conductor of the Boston orchestra were fully realized.

Mr. Henry L. Higginson, the founder and patron of this orchestra, has for the fourth time shown his rare good judgment in selecting a proper conductor, and the Boston musical public is again his debtor for his action in this direction.

Mr. Paur is a master of the art of conducting; he holds the most absolute control over his men, swaying them at will, and controlling the several sections as if they were each a single instrument. He conveys his ideas in the most unmistakable fashion, his beat is decisive and distinct at all times, his indications of the cues cannot fail to be understood, and, all in all, he combines as many excellent qualifications for his position as any man America has yet had an opportunity to pass judgment upon.

HERR EMIL PAUR.

Emil Paur
Conductor

He is evidently a born musician, and has developed his natural faculties in the most thorough fashion, his handling of the orchestra last evening showing a thorough understanding of the possibilities of every instrument and the power to bring these possibilities to his aid in the presentation of his ideas of the several compositions.

The evening's programme was begun with the great fifth symphony of Beethoven, a work well calculated to display the intelligence, taste and ability of a conductor. The reading given the symphony was a masterly one in every way.

Thoroughly conservative in its general characteristics, it yet revealed its manifold beauties with a clearness and grace that at once established the standing of the new conductor as a man whose lead can be safely followed by all seeking to know the "immortal nine" in all their perfection.

No better interpretation of this symphony can be recalled since the elder Dambrosch electrified a select audience in this city many years ago by a performance of the work. It is impossible to consider the individual merits of the reading at this time.

Tschaikowsky's serenade for strings in C major, op. 48, followed the symphony, and in his performance of the several movements Mr. Paur used the string section of the band with faultless grace and finish. The ever changing moods of the composition were splendidly reproduced, and the playing of the men was controlled as absolutely as if the conductor had a single instrument at his own command. The sensuous waltz movement was given with a swing and grace that would have done credit to the "Waltz King," and the virtuosity of the players was admirably displayed in the difficult finale.

Mr. Paur completed his evening's programme with a performance of the "Tannhauser" overture that fairly electrified his audience, and sent them away from the hall full of enthusiasm over his skill as a conductor. The colossal beauties of this old overture were brought out in the boldest fashion, and the massive use of tone color indulged in by Wagner in this composition was splendidly realized in its interpretation.

The evening had many events of interest aside from the programme and its performance. Mrs. Paur was present to witness the triumphs of her husband, occupying a modest position in the left section near the stage. Mr. Henry L. Higginson occupied his usual seat, and had much difficulty in escaping the congratulations thrust upon him from all sides after the concert.

The conductor's desk was elegantly decked in honor of the occasion, and, above all, it can be said that the interest shown by the men of the orchestra in carrying out, in the minutest fashion, the clearly expressed directions of Mr. Paur, were at all times manifest.

Mr. Paur is a welcome addition to musical Boston.

WHAT THE TRIBUNE SAYS.

Lacks Faults of Previous Conductors, but Has Some of His Own.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 14, 1893. Regarding the Symphony rehearsal in Boston yesterday afternoon, and the concert this evening, and the new conductor, the Tribune critic says: The consuming curiosity which the musical people of Boston have felt for six months past concerning the personality, methods and artistic ideals of the new conductor of the Symphony orchestra was measurably gratified by the first public rehearsal and concert of the season, which took place on Friday afternoon and last night.

It is not likely that any other city in the world could have developed quite so profound a feeling on just such a subject. The conductor cult is a phase of social activity which flourishes only in Boston. It is true, indications of something like it have appeared here and in several other cities occasionally, but a complete parallel to Boston is yet to be found. In a sense the cult is the outgrowth of a latter-day development in music.

Largely through the influence of Wagner, conductors have become virtuosi. They are now hired for their skill and training as specialists; they command salaries which are beginning to approach those of eminent singers and instrumentalists; naturally, also, they have their following and their critics. Fifty or 75 years ago such things were not dreamed of. When the conductor sat at his harpsichord and took part in the accompaniment, or when he beat time with a roll of paper, turning his back on the musicians, as compelled by deference due to august listeners, he was a comparatively small factor in the sum of music making. The chapel masters of kings and nobles were not conductors so much as they were composers, bound to provide new music for the court band and maintain discipline in that body, which meant to keep its members conscious of their duties as menials in the house hold. Conducting, moreover, was then little else than time beating. A change followed the dawn of the romantic period, when characteristic beauty and poetical expression came into their rights as Elements in Music.

This change lifted interpretation, so called, into prominence, which, working retroactively, has ever since sought to find the essence of new wines in old bottles. The tendency was to some extent based on truth, but the liberty which it gave the conductor has frequently been strained into license, and it was largely through the medium of just such straining that the conductor grew into the hitherto unheard of importance, such great importance indeed, that his dictum concerning the meaning of a composer often has seemed sufficient to work an estoppel of appeal to the composer himself.

Boston contains a large number of music lovers, and it was not at all strange that the conductor question should there take on large dimensions. Perhaps it never would have developed to an abnormal size if the Symphony orchestra concerts, especially the Friday afternoon rehearsals, had not become pre-eminently social functions. Good form has for years compelled attendance on them, whether one is fond of music or not. Of course, persons who patronized artistic enterprises for wholly extraneous reasons are bound to champion the cause of the powers that be in the enterprises. Here we have the beginning of a faction which naturally finds an ally in the conservative or the radical persons who love music and whose tastes chance to be humored by the conductor.

The existence of a conductor's party, by the same token, presupposes the existence of an opposition. For four years the musical government of Boston has been radical and the conservatives have been in opposition. The first rehearsal and concert under the new regime have reduced things to a state of flux, which, we imagine, will endure for several weeks. When the state of fixity comes again, we imagine, further, it will be found that the parties have been reconstructed. It will not be surprising if the young Symphony rehearsal women shall withdraw in force from the government and join the opposition, and that a great many now in opposition from other reasons than a simple desire to be "agin the government" shall espouse the cause of the new conductor.

The reasons for this belief will appear in the course of such a discussion of the new conductor as was made possible by his first appearance. He is Emil Paur, until a few weeks ago conductor at the Stadt Theatre in Leipzig. This theatre, by the way, is the stepping stone by which German conductors mount to American altitudes in their profession. When Anton Seidl was conductor there, Arthur Nikisch was his assistant. Seidl came to America and Nikisch moved up. When Nikisch received his call to Boston, Paur came his successor at Leipzig. Now Nikisch has gone to Buda-Pesth, and Paur succeeds him in Boston.

The newcomer is a conductor of considerable experience. He has wielded the baton at Cassel, Koenigsberg and Mannheim, as well as Leipzig. He is studious, energetic, conscientious and devoted to his work, fond of the music of the forward young composers of today, a Wagnerite from conviction, and professedly a believer that the music of classic writers ought to be read in the spirit of their time. So far as his published creed is concerned, it is unobjectionable, but probably his critics in Boston will sooner believe his acts than his words. He is a man of large frame and large head; his face is covered with a typical Teutonic beard, and in appearance as well as bearing he realizes the German conviction that strength goes before beauty. He is not a graceful man, and he will prove a grievous disappointment to the gushing Symphony persons who doted on Mr. Nikisch by reason of his interesting pallor, his dainty hands and his attitudes. Mr. Paur is built of homelier stuff. His beat is heavy, jerky and angular, and the sight of it does not help one to the enjoyment of the music. Its purpose, however, is unmistakable; it is not the public. He beats time, and he beats dynamics, but he does not try "with waving arms" to suggest the emotional contents of the music to the public.

Meant for the Musicians.

All of these things will be disappointing to many of the patrons of the public rehearsals, but if they serve to divert attention from the man to the music there will be compensation in that fact. Whatever else he may encourage, Mr. Paur will not encourage affectation. He looks and acts like a man incapable of it himself, and intolerant of it in others. Affectation is the bane of musical culture.

So much for the physical manifestations. The intellectual are more significant. Mr. Paur's program contained only three numbers, but they sufficed to make plain what will probably on longer and better acquaintance prove to be the characteristics of his works. They were Beethoven's symphony in C minor, the Tchaikowsky's serenade for strings in C major, op. 48, and Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser"—three works, each of which bears the stamp of its composer's individuality.

In an interview printed in the BOSTON HERALD last Sunday Mr. Paur disclaimed sympathy with a tendency attributed to Wagner to invest some of Beethoven's symphonies with scenic and dramatic elements which lie outside of purely musical expression. We do not know to which composition he referred, but we do know that a great many sins of interpretation have been laid at Wagner's door for which he was not responsible. It does not follow if a champion of Wagner distorts and abuses a symphony as Mr.

Nikisch and Mr. Thomas distorted and abused Beethoven's seventh at some of their concerts a few seasons ago, and Dr. von Bulow the minuet of the eighth, they do it.

Because Wagner Wished It to be done. Mr. Nikisch's grievous work with the first movement was simple erraticism, and possibly a seeking after catch-penny effects; Mr. Thomas' innovations were the outcome of pedantic studies in scientific phrasing. They held him captive for awhile and then he frankly abandoned them. Dr. von Bulow's notions were exaggerations of some of Wagner's suggestions, uttered in protest against an abuse in the opposite direction. In each case appeal to Beethoven's printed page and the canons of beauty which had universal validity in Beethoven's day brought out a judgment of condemnation.

Of similar wrong-doing Mr. Paur must be acquitted. He did not strive to impress any novel conception on the C minor symphony. He did mar its beauty, but it was not through any wish to inject into it things that never entered Beethoven's mind. He hurt it by exaggerated emphasis and a detached style of performance, which we have observed as an outgrowth of the Bayreuth influence. It is a good rule to ask the players upon the wind instruments to phrase as if they were vocal performers, but this does not mean that the charm of continuity of idea should be sacrificed in order that every phrase, and occasionally a motive, may stand out from the fabrics in all the sharpness of its outline.

Mr. Paur believes that Beethoven sometimes built his works on a poetical idea. Such a one, a venerable tradition tells us, underlies the C minor symphony. It is not necessary, however, to enforce this upon the attention of the hearers to make such a proclamation of of the symphony that only loudness and angularity are to be noted as its characteristics. Even here homogeneity and beauty of tone count for something. This striving after sonority is one of the pitfalls of the fiery, untamed conductor of the present. It leads them to try to build up climaxes by dynamics, instead of musical means.

The Fundamental Theme

The Boston Symphony orchestra is a superb band, peculiarly admirable in its string choir. These strings have never had the fullness and richness of tone, the all-compelling and all-satisfying muscularity since Mr. Gericke went away that they had when he was their conductor. Yet Mr. Gericke never forced them any more than he forced the brass choir. There was a great volume of tone at times in the Tchaikowsky serenade last Friday, but it seemed to have been acquired at such a cost of labor that the lightness and grace which are the chief adornments of the work were woefully wanting. It was always strong, capably worked out at times, in respect of the rubato and the treatment of the voices, but not for a moment elegant.

The "Tannhauser" overture threw all of the features of Mr. Paur of which we have been obliged to speak in dispraise, into the boldest relief; but in this music they worked less harm. It was an extremely lively reading, very much like that to which Mr. Seidl has accustomed his audiences, but it showed a masterful hand in the development of climaxes and a superb ability to hold his forces in serried ranks on the top of a dramatic hill so long as it was necessary they should be there.

It ought to be said as bearing upon some of this criticism that the orchestra was not in such condition as it will soon be after it has got down to regular practice. It was decidedly rusty, in fact, and that this circumstance unquestionably accentuated most of the things which must be pronounced unlovely in last Friday's public rehearsal.

Mr. Paur was most graciously and warmly welcomed by the audience, and while there was no lack of fault finding, neither was there want of encouraging and approving applause.

HENRY E. KREHBIEL.

WEIGHT, DIGNITY, CORRECTNESS.

Qualities Which the New York Times Attributes to Mr. Paur.

[Special Dispatch to the Sunday Herald.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 14, 1893. The Times says of the Boston Symphony's new conductor:

"For the sake of art it is a great pity that the personal element should enter so strongly into the public consideration of artistic matters. Rossini wrote music simply that Patti might sing it; Chopin wrote scherzos only that Paderewski might interpret them; Beethoven composed symphonies that conductors might have 'readings.' Yet, there are cases in which the personality of a single man means much, and one of these is in the direction of an important orchestra.

Four years ago Wilhelm Gericke laid down the baton of the Boston Symphony orchestra and Arthur Nikisch took it up. Already the fame of the organization had grown so wide that it was regarded as a national rather than a local body. Persons from various cities, including, as a matter of course, the metropolis flocking to Boston to attend the result of the new man and to try to foretell the future of the splendid orchestra over which he was to preside. Today Bostonians are called upon to sit at the feet of a new conductor. Nikisch is no longer a name to conjure with. His pale, thoughtful face; his silken, pendent hair; his eloquent, conspicuous hands, and his passionate, erratic readings have all taken wings to themselves. The causes of their flight need not now concern any one. They were not nice.

Of the unavailing efforts of Col. Henry L. Higginson—who is not and never was T. Wentworth Higginson, though many newspapers of high degree have tried to make him so—to secure Dr. Hans Richter of Vienna; of the doctor's willingness to come, and of the inviolability of his contract, the tale has been told.

Emil Paur is the name of the new man who was finally engaged, and whom at yesterday's public rehearsal and tonight's concert all Boston went out to see. The verb "to see" is used advisedly, for even Boston, with all its intellect, is human.

Paur Is an Austrian.

born at Czernow, in the province of Bukowina. He was a fellow-student of Nikisch and Felix Mottl at Vienna. He has been conductor at Cassel, gloried by the memory of Spohr, and at Koenigsburg, at Mannheim and at Leipzig. In all of these places he directed the opera. He also appeared as a violinist and a piano virtuoso. Thus much Boston learned about him through the patient industry of the newspaper scribes, for, painful though it be to admit it no one in Boston had ever heard of him before.

But such information did not go far toward satisfying the heart-hunger of that marvelous production of nature, not unassisted by art, the Boston Symphony matinee girl. Was the new conductor handsome? Was he blessed with a serene countenance, suggestive of an oatmeal diet and early death? Was he not at least poetic and æsthetic? Did he have soulful banes? And did his clothes fit him? What were 20,000 "readings" if he were to turn out to be short, rotund and prone to limpness of the collar?

It is not likely that the matinee girl will soon recover from the dreadful shock which struck her emotional centre when Emil Paur stepped upon the stage of the Boston Music Hall for the first time. If ever there was a plain, prosaic, "Hofcapelmeister" looking conductor, it is Paur. He is not especially short, nor does he run far toward globularity, but his architecture is severely doric. His hair is a dingy brown—long, of course—and his face is conspicuous by reason of the prominence of the cheekbones and the length of his lower jaw.

Paur Is Not Pretty

to look at. As for his manner of conducting, it is certainly rigorous. His down beat is full of conscious rectitude, and the relations of the other beats to it are sanctified by the fundamental truth of trigonometry. It is certain that the remark of Little Buttercup about Dick Deadeye may be fairly applied to the new conductor. "He is a little triangular."

Alas for the palpitating matinee girl! No more graceful curves that seemed to wave the music out of the air, as though they were the summonses of a magician's wand; nothing now but a cold, intellectual, accurately measured beat, for which, perhaps, the members of the orchestra rein secret profoundly grateful; for a good, intelligible beat with the weight of head, hands, arms, back and directorial solemnity behind it, has this one a admirable quality: It will keep an orchestra acquainted with the conductor's wishes as to tempo.

Now, as to that mighty significant, yet mysterious, matter called "reading." Mr. Paur called upon Boston yesterday afternoon and tonight to judge of his quality through the performance of Beethoven's fifth symphony, Tchaikowsky's serenade for strings in C major, op. 48, and Wagner's "Tannhauser" overture. No soloist was permitted to obtrude upon the scheme. The conductor himself furnished enough of the personal element.

It may be prophesied, with a reasonable amount of assurance, that Mr. Paur's readings will never assume what is called a revolutionary tendency. His conception of the Beethoven symphony was one of which even Carl Zerrahn need not have been ashamed. It was one which could not have aroused very greatly the combativeness of Theodore Thomas, an attentive listener. It was thoroughly respectable and eminently respectable. It permitted Tradition to sit with accustomed squareness on her oaken throne, and it diffused of general comfort.

A Mild and Gentle Glow

But there is such a thing as carrying a reading too far, even though it be one whose correctness is indisputable. It is said to be necessary for the sculptor to study anatomy. It is not deemed essential, however, that he should practice the science of dissecting. Neither is it essential that a conductor should so far impose his process of intellectual analysis upon a performance that the articulation of a symphony should be exposed. Yet this was what Paur did. That inexorable down beat made late knock at the door with the arsis of every measure, while every phrase came out with neatly-trimmed corners.

In the simple, elementary rhythm of the final march this square-cut manner was decidedly in place; in the sensuous and nte it was quite as decidedly out. Yet here the splendid quality of the Boston strings came to the conductor's rescue and gained for him a result which was not his own.

On the whole, the performance of the fifth symphony was acceptable. To those who are rightly weary of attempts to dramatize Beethoven it must have been a general relief. But it was unleniably a cold, calculated correctness that pervaded it, and some hearers must have been reminded of a Von Bulow piano recital, or a cavan by Judasohn.

However, those who were wondering whether there was any real temperament concealed under the somewhat modest exterior turned with expectancy to the second number, the serenade. Again weight, force, deliberation, ponderosity. The lovely languorous, delicately-treated valse came with heavy steps and affected ritardandi. Where were all the infinitesimal nuances, the dainty lacework of lights and shades, like sunlight shot through forest boughs, that Gericke would have scattered through.

This Sinuous Scherzando

Was there no lightness in the man? Oh, for a single moment of Gallic volatility, poised on tiptoe, and with an airy kiss blown from fingertips! There is a time to laugh, and a time to sing. It is not always time to count three in a bar. Enough of this serenade. Now for the "Tannhaeuser" overture.

Again weight and force, but now also dignity, for the music of the opening measures bears calm, sustained treatment. The end of the "Pilgrim's Chorus" is reached. The strings slip away into the weird mysteries of the bacchanale. Now, now for more passion! Grudfully the agitation of the orchestra grows. There is a grim resolution about the down beat. There is a deep earnestness in the conductor's face at last. There is a glow under this homely exterior. It is not a flash; not a burst of fire; but it is warmth and the climax of the overture is reached in a finely developed, powerfully accentuated crescendo.

And so we came to the end of this first view of the new man from Leipsic. Final judgment as to his ability cannot now be pronounced. But unless nervousness and anxiety wholly changed the habit of the man, it is safe to say that weight, dignity and correctness, rather than grace, poetry and passion, will prove to be the salient qualities of Emil Paur's conducting.

These are by no means qualities to be despised. The classic writers left us a very precious legacy, which is safe from violent treatment in the hands of just such men as Paur. Perhaps the modern romanticists may not seem to be quite so romantic under his beat, but that remains to be proved. From his first concert one would naturally expect to find that his most admirable achievements would prove to be the explication of a Bacchic fugue.

The attitude of the audiences toward the new conductor was not inspiring. The applause was of a conservative nature. Perhaps in the future, when Boston is better acquainted with Mr. Paur he may arouse enthusiasm.

W. G. HENDERSON.

LOCAL COMMENTS.

Opinions of Boston Musicians Upon Mr. Paur's Abilities.

In response to requests made, a number of musicians and composers have presented briefly their impressions of Mr. Paur's abilities, as formed by a hearing of his opening concert last evening. Some curious declinations were received, and it is to be hoped that some of the writers will recall their own words when, in the future, they may read critical opinions formed under the circumstances they were called upon to adapt themselves to in this instance. It may be well, for the benefit of readers unfamiliar with Boston's musicians, to indicate the standing of those who have contributed their opinion upon this subject.

Mr. B. J. Lang is the conductor of the Cecilia and Apollo clubs and director and organist at King's Chapel. Mr. George L. Osgood was for years director of the Boylston Club and subsequently of the Boston Singers. Mr. George E. Whiting is director of music and organist at the Church of the Immaculate Conception. Mr. Carl Faetten is at the head of the New England Conservatory, and a pianist and composer. Mr. Thomas Ryan of the Mendelssohn Quintet club needs no introduction; he is known from Maine to California, and has known every conductor in this country for a generation. Mr. L. S. Thompson represents the younger school of American musicians, and, although known at present most prominently as the composer of "Prince Pro Tem," is generally admitted to be a representative of the best education of today. Mrs. H. H. A. Beach is accepted as the leading woman composer of America at the present time, her compositions and writing having won her a recognition in the world of music which entitles her opinions to the prominence given them.

Mr. B. J. Lang.

To the Editor of the Herald: In response to your courteous request for my impressions of Mr. Paur as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, I must declare that the judgment that can be formed after a single concert must be at best rather unreliable. The opinion of any one of the many distinguished musicians in the orchestra who have played under Mr. Paur's conducting for a week or more, must be far more valuable than that of a listener of a single performance. The devoted attention and evidently eager desire of the entire orchestra to respond to Mr. Paur in every indication of his wishes, speaks volumes for the regard and respect that he has already obtained from them. What wonderful changes—thanks to Mr. Higginson—have come over our musical conditions in Boston in these last 20 years!

I have previous to the last dozen years seen the services of two of the three most famous conductors of the world offered to us for the asking, and lost to us for the simple lack of that asking, while now we are eagerly welcoming our fourth new conductor.

Now that our Symphony orchestra is in its teens, let us hope that the illnesses of early youth have all been endured, and that from now on it will thrive in blessed health and vigor. With the warmest welcome to Mr. Paur and the highest anticipations of his success with us, I am yours,

B. J. LANG.

George L. Osgood.

To the Editor of the Herald: There was a sturdy, wholesome manliness about the whole performance. The figures were always wonderfully clear. The rhythms were magnificent. The conducting was earpest and painstaking. The impression upon the orchestra was positive to the last degree.

In place of poetic license, there was a determined control on given lines.

After a few concerts Mr. Paur will probably get into the full swing of all his forces, and will give us opportunity to see him at his best, hardly possible in a first concert with an orchestra almost new to him.

The conductor himself is a manly fellow.

GEORGE L. OSGOOD.

George E. Whiting.

To the Editor of the Herald: It would be out of the question for me to judge intelligently of Mr. Paur after the performance of tonight. Still, one can give a tolerably shrewd guess that the new conductor belongs decidedly to the old school of capelmeisters—good musicians and capable conductors, but perhaps not brilliant men, especially as regards their attitude toward the new school of composers. It would be exceedingly difficult to find a man to follow Mr. Nikish possessing this brilliant qualities and at the same time the wonderful power of drill which Mr. Gericke had to a superlative degree. Looked at in this light the new conductor's conservatism will be welcome to the musical public I have no doubt.

GEORGE E. WHITING.

Carl Faetten.

To the Editor of the Herald: I attended the rehearsal yesterday, and in my opinion Bostonians are to be congratulated to see again at the head of our Symphony orchestra another excellent conductor. The first impressions of Mr. Emil Paur's work are very favorable in every respect, and I am looking forward with great pleasure and interest toward the continuation of the series. Yours very truly,

CARL FAETTEN.

Thomas Ryan.

To the Editor of the Herald: I was greatly pleased and satisfied with Mr. Paur as a director. Evidently he had full control over the orchestra. The performance of the symphony made that manifest. Each movement was played with great deliberation and repose of manner—fine balance of parts—and with most careful attention to the pianissimo passages. The finale march was an ideal heroic performance.

The Tchaikowsky suite was delightful. The brilliant last movement was well played and showed up the fine string force. To some people the "Tannhaeuser" overture would be the piece to prove ability. Well, his ability was proved. The difference in manner from that displayed in the Beethoven symphony was quite apparent. The nervous, driving, passionate performance was all there. The purely personal part of the conductor is all right. Simple, unaffected, comes on to the stage quietly and attends to the business, and evidently has a human interest in the people who are about him and are to aid him in his future work.

Mr. Higginson and all music lovers can congratulate themselves and feel sure that they have a genuine musician in their new director.

THOMAS RYAN.

L. S. Thompson.

To the Editor of the Herald: There is so much that seems to me entirely new, both in Mr. Paur's style of conducting and in his conception of the music, that I find it almost impossible to form any permanent opinion of him from a single hearing.

The rendering of the Beethoven symphony, especially, seemed to me a revelation, and gave me intense pleasure. On the whole, Mr. Paur appears to me a conductor of remarkable ability in his control of the orchestra and his general grasp of the music.

He seems like a man of intense musical temperament, and one whom we shall like better and better the more we hear him.

L. S. THOMPSON.

Mrs. H. H. A. Beach.

To the Editor of the Herald: A well chosen programme presented a comparative novelty in the serenade and such an exemplification of the classical and romantic schools in the symphony and the overture as would supply a fair and adequate test of the capacity and courage of our new conductor.

Mr. Paur's reading of the 5th Symphony was characterized by dignity, clearness and brilliancy, with the addition in the andante of a reverential tenderness worthy of the highest praise. Exception might be taken to the tempo of this movement, which was played at an extremely slow pace, but the rendering was so consistent and broad throughout that only occasionally was any sense of dragging noticeable. The first movement was presented with fine attention to the slightest marks of the composer; the fermata, especially were treated with rare judgment.

Mr. Paur's firm and decisive beat carried the cellos and basses through the trio of the Scherzo with as near an approach to clearness as the music will permit, and the finale was a genuine triumph of brilliancy.

Many phases of great beauty in regard to shading and refinement of expression might be instanced, such as the leading up to the last movement from the scherzo, where there was a wonderfully steady pianissimo with no crescendo until the exact moment indicated by Beethoven, eight measures before the allegro. The entire interpretation was free from capricious variations in tempo or phrasing, and the playing remarkable for its precision and sincerity.

Tchaikowsky's serenade displayed the sonority of the strings to good advantage, while the "Tannhaeuser" overture received a performance worthy of a high place among the successes of the orchestra.

It is already evident that Mr. Paur is a disciplinarian and executant of a high order. If his manner, to which as yet we are hardly accustomed, appears somewhat rigid, let us hope that the mathematical accuracy, of which it seemed to be a part, accounted for the unusually satisfactory performance of his orchestra after a long vacation and comparatively few rehearsals, promising much for the future of music in Boston.

....Mrs. Emil Paur continues to be interviewed for her husband, who does not speak English. She is indeed a helpmeet.

A HEAD ON ITS SHOULDERS.

Symphony Orchestra Has a Leader.

Director Paur Gives Promise of a Great Success.

Gilbert & Sullivan's Latest Opera, "Utopia."

The head of that superb body, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has been again placed upon its shoulders and a hand has grasped the helm of its efforts, a strong, skilful hand that will now guide it firmly and surely after its four seasons of drifting in a disabled state before the violence of vagarious tempests. The pilot that has come to the rescue is Mr. Emil Paur—let us rejoice.

The Music Hall on Saturday evening was overflowed with an audience gathered to welcome the new conductor and to satisfy a curiosity and relieve an anxiety regarding his ability that has existed since it was made known who was to take charge of this fine body of musicians that under Mr. Gericke had reached the highest point of perfection in orchestral playing, and under Mr. Nikisch had fallen to a state of indifference, coarseness and sometimes vulgarity of performance that was a disgrace to the band and an undeniable mark of the incompetency of the conductor that incumbered the position so honored by his predecessor.

That Mr. Paur should have accomplished so much under the circumstances, on Saturday evening, as was shown in the results, gave the intelligent and critical listeners the best of reasons to believe that he is master of the situation, and will prove a success as regards his ability to fill the position to which he is elected when he has had the orchestra longer in hand.

Mr. Paur chose for his first programme, the beginning of the 13th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the following works:

Symphony No. 5 in C minor.....Beethoven Serenade for strings in C major op 48.....Tchaikowsky
Overture to "Tannhauser".....Wagner
In the interpretation of the symphony Mr. Paur kept to the true spirit of the composer, as indicated in the score.

There was nothing of exaggeration, no attempt to improve Beethoven. In the rendering, and the tempo of the different movements was the traditional one, it perhaps the andante con moto be excepted, which was taken at a rather slow pace. Nevertheless as a whole this movement was a noble conception upon the tempo assumed, and was a revelation of the purity of Mr. Paur's taste, the depth of his feeling and the extreme sensitiveness of his musical nature. So, also, of the first movement, to which he imparted a nobility in the rendering. The Scherzo was taken at a most discreet tempo, and was finely contrasted between the delicacy of the softer passages and the vigor and strength of those founded upon the second theme beginning in the basses. The last movement was surpassing fine in its majesty, perhaps never has it been more satisfactorily given by the orchestra.

The Tchaikowsky "Serenade for Strings" is in some respects an interesting work. It has been played but once before in these concerts, by Mr. Gericke, at the beginning of the season of 1888. It may not be particularly original, and the movements vary materially in musical value, but it displays contrapuntal ingenuity, and with its characteristic melodies and strongly marked rhythms its rather tedious length was less marked than it would have been otherwise. The theme with variations is taken from another Suite of Tchaikowsky's, No. 3 in G. Under the skilful direction of Mr. Paur the orchestra achieved a brilliant success in the playing of this number of the programme.

The familiar overture to "Tannhauser," that closed the concert, was given in a most brilliant and effective manner, and the large audience that had most cordially welcomed Mr. Paur when he first appeared at the beginning of the evening, broke into the most enraptured applause, recalling him again and again with cheers and bravos.

On the whole, it must be admitted that Mr. Paur has made a most satisfactory beginning. He is modest and earnest in his bearing; there is nothing of the poseur in his composition; he does not find it necessary to climb up on two or three boxes to exhibit himself; his whole soul is in his work, and he appears to be totally unconscious of the presence of an audience; he has a firm beat and every movement is of significant importance to the players; he has a fine musical temperament, apparently; to all appearances is sensitive and refined to a high degree in his musical nature; he has a just sense of the necessity of contrast, and imparts repose in the renderings. He gives the orchestra more sway than Mr. Gericke, and does not restrict the brass as the latter did. Under Mr. Paur the wood-wind has been restored to a sense of discretion in its use. Mr. Paur produced a fine pianissimo and did not force his fortissimos. That wonderful gradation of tone that made Mr. Gericke's work pre-eminent, was not observable, however, in the playing Saturday night. I mean that acute distinction between pp and p, p and mf, mf and f, and f and ff. It may seem hypercritical to expect such distinctions, but

The delight that the critical ear has experienced in the realization of these tints and half tints, and minute colorings of Mr. Gericke's renderings leaves the sensitive and keenly appreciative listener always yearning for their reproduction, a sensation so gratifying that its elimination from the memory is impossible; neither has it been blunted in the remembrance by the rough charcoal sketches and undefined masses of color that have been shown upon the canvas during the past four seasons.

But there is time yet for Mr. Paur to accomplish more in the dynamical and technical direction when he shall have had the orchestra longer under his control. All the roughness of the last regime had not disappeared in the playing Saturday night.

There is this yet to be ascertained: Will Mr. Paur exert his authority, and through rigid, inflexible discipline, oblige the players to do their best when, as the season advances, they get tired and careless and heedless of his desires? It seems to me that Mr. Paur is the man who will maintain a high degree of technical perfection and dynamic contrast throughout, but that he will reach that automatic perfection once possessed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra remains to be proved.

Also the all-important feature of catholic taste in selecting music for the programmes and a happy ability in arranging the same is yet to be decided. Also will he begin promptly at 8 o'clock, and make his programmes conform to the limit of one hour and a half. Well, we shall see. In the meantime let us rejoice that we have so good a conductor and so refined a musician, and also so superb an orchestra as has been provided by the noble generosity of Mr. Henry L. Higginson, by whose munificent impulse art and his townsmen are so liberally benefited.

Next Saturday evening the programme will embrace overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; Rhapsodie No. 2, Dvorak, and Schubert's great symphony in C major. Mrs. Lillian Nordica will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Season Opens Brilliantly and Musical Bostonians Seem Delighted with Mr Nikisch's Successor.

The 13th season of the Symphony orchestral concerts has opened brilliantly. Music hall was crowded with fashion and wealth at the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at last evening's concert. Seemingly few of the patrons of former years were absent.

Everybody was glad that the concerts had begun again, and nobody hesitated to express his or her gratification.

Rarely has a symphony gathering been so demonstrative in welcoming the orchestra. As one after the other of the favorite members of the band came upon the stage they were greeted with hearty plaudits, and when it was evident that few if any of the prominent members of last year's organization were missing there was more and still warmer applause.

The reception accorded the new director, Mr. Emil Paur, was enthusiastically cordial. They wanted him to at once feel that he was among friends and among those who are capable of appreciating to the fullest extent his rare musical attainments.

If Mr Paur does not feel thoroughly at home in Boston today it is not because of any lack of good will on the part of those who listened to his first concert in this city.

Before the Friday rehearsal was over it was evident that the new director would be a great favorite in Boston, and at last night's concert there was still further assurance of his coming popularity. The generally expressed opinion was that Mr Higginson had secured a worthy successor for the two master musicians who have directed this foremost of all orchestral organizations.

In appearance Mr Paur differs essentially from either of his predecessors, and he is as unlike them in his method of conducting. He is of large, solid physique, and his manner of directing is most substantial, if not absolutely heavy.

There is little that is light or graceful in his style. He directs with determination and exactness rather than with enthusiasm.

He does not seem to be possessed of great personal magnetism. He is a leader who will inspire confidence rather than enthusiasm. He makes one feel that he knows absolutely what he is doing, and compels confidence in the correctness of all that he does.

None of his predecessors gave at first hearing such forcible evidence of thorough control over every individual member of the orchestra. Mr Paur's command over all was absolute.

There will surely be no lack of discipline in the Boston symphony orchestra so long as Mr Paur is at its head, and there is every reason for believing that the splendid organization will, under his careful direction, not only maintain its position at the head of all orchestras, but will advance still further towards the goal of perfection.

The program provided for his first offering was characteristic of the man.

It was conservative and substantial. Mr Paur is, from all indications, inclined to classical music, and it is unlikely that anything of a trivial nature will ever be allowed to appear upon his programs.

On the contrary his offerings will likely be of an educational character.

Beethoven's grand fifth symphony, Tchaikowsky's serenade for strings in C and the "Tannhauser" overture constituted yesterday's numbers.

Naturally the greatest interest was felt in his reading of the symphony, for no one who knows anything about music is ignorant of the position occupied in musical compositions by this grand work.

His interpretation of the work was worthy of the cordial praise bestowed upon it. His was a faithful reading, rather more exact than that offered by Mr. Nikisch. He does not seem inclined to innovations of his own, but is content to perform a composition as its writer intended it should be. It is difficult to single out especial excellence, so generally praise-worthy was the interpretation. Particularly delightful, however, was the effect attained in that marvelous transition from the scherzo to the final; it has never been better performed here.

Mr Paur is to be commended for placing the symphony first on his program, and it is to be hoped that he will adhere to this rule.

The Tchaikowsky serenade was given a graceful artistic interpretation, but more lightness and lightness might have been welcome in the waltz movement. The Wagner overture was very delightful, the softer sentimental passages being given with especially delightful effect.

It is too soon to express a decided opinion as to Mr. Paur's rank among his predecessors, but he has certainly made a splendid beginning for Boston favor.

The program of the next concert is as follows: Volkmann's overture, "Richard III.," Dvorak's rhapsodie No. 2; Schubert's symphony in C major; soloist, Mme Nordica.

THE SYMPHONIES. Journal

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began last evening, with the interesting, if not exciting, circumstance of the appearance of a new conductor. The organization that is the result of Mr. Higginson's generous impulse and patient fostering is now surely on a firm foundation. It is a public institution that adds abroad a glory to our town; and there is no doubt that the orchestra is appreciated here, although there may be open discussion of the merits and faults of conductors who come and go, fret for an idle day, or are for lasting benefit as musicians and disciplinarians. So let us all welcome the season now begun, and if there be any shaking of the head at the number 13, absit omen!

These weekly concerts are indeed "a sweet boon" to us, as, according to Artemus, the Tower is to London. To many, Saturday evening in winter would not exist without this musical enjoyment, and when there is occasionally a breathing spell, in the absence of the orchestra, the regular goers find time heavy. The theatres are usually crowded Saturday night, and enforced staying at home saddens many victims of the Symphony habit.

Then the appearance of the conductor and the men, the latest gossip concerning some alleged behavior or belief of one of the musicians, the atmospheric condition of the hall, the state of the Saturday evening weather—all these furnish food for conversation at table and in street car for at least two days after the concert. And occasionally there is talk about the music that was played.

This going to Music Hall of a Saturday evening is to many an amusement, a regularly recurring amusement that in certain respects is not unlike dram-drinking. It is a pleasure not without acute excitement, followed, particularly after a long-winded symphony, by a condition of dull lethargy. And yet these good people might be offended seriously, if they were classed as amusement-seekers; they look upon the Symphony concerts as educational, as making for culture. But they might be sorely put to it, if they were required to explain just how and when and where they gained in civilization.

The sense of gratifying a longing for amusement does not preclude criticism, particularly destructive criticism; nor would it be well perhaps to inquire concerning the foundation for any reasonable criticism to rest upon. Boston is very critical, and it seems occasionally that the only real pleasure of the inhabitants is in the investigation or explanation of this question: Why do we not find pleasure in this or that? It is only at the "Pop" concerts that music is accepted gratefully and sympathetically by the crowd, and there is no doubt that in this case pleasant eating and drinking and smoking pave the way to musical enjoyment.

MR. EMIL PAUR, the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, is said to be a trustworthy and excellent musician, but hardly a genius. There is comfort in that thought. Of all the varieties of the human "genius" that which assumes an artistic habit is the most exasperating and, specifically, the musical genius is the most unendurable. The competition between the man of talent and the man of genius is a parallel of the race between the tortoise and the hare, and we all know how that contest ended. Your genius is not without his value. He wakes up people, whether they follow him or not; he has the boldness of his convictions and though he may shock us by his defiance of conventionalities he often serves to show that certain forms have lost their significance, while he illustrates the axiom that there is room in the world for everybody who is decent. The exasperation which the genius often engenders is due to his want of catholicity. He shouts for freedom of thought and action, but makes faces at those who think and act otherwise than he lays down for the correct thing. He demands consideration for the new thought, the new form, and has nothing but contempt for all that has gone before. This is not the sort of man to aid in the development of art in this country. Our large assortment of parentage has made us the most cosmopolitan people in the world and we will no more be satisfied with one phase of an art, whether the limner's, the sculptor's or the musician's, than we will consent to an unchanged bill of fare for a month's breakfasts, though the ingredients be never so nicely cooked and dextrously served. We can be easily persuaded to listen to anything, but prohibition of what we want or dictation of what we ought to want will alike breed rebellion. The man of talent holds his ground, for he knows how to be elastic and tactful; the man of genius mars all by his stiffness and impolitic methods.

EVENTS OF A DAY.

Comer

BOSTON GREETES HERR EMIL PAUR AT THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

B. A. A. BICYCLE RACE—CANDIDATE GREEN
HALGE SPEAKS—HARVARD WIPES OUT
WILLIAMS AT FOOTBALL—DINNERS.

The Symphony Orchestra have never played a programme better than they played last night the first of the present season. Indeed, in some respects, they have perhaps never played so well. The rehearsals under Mr. Paur have effected a cordial understanding between him and his men and have established a standard for the maintenance of which they will be held to a strict accountability. Aware, as they could not help being, of the severe but by no means unjust criticism which had been made upon the work of the orchestra in its gradual deterioration under Mr. Nikisch, every man has set himself from the first rehearsal to play for all his worth, in order to assist in proving their right to the praise—always cheerfully accorded them when they did their best—of constituting one of the finest bands in the world. On his part, Mr. Paur, gratified to find an instrument of such strength, ductility and capability for perfect detail under his hand, has been able to use it frankly, without tentatives, reserves, doubts or struggles. The result was splendid, and if the conductor merited the long and loud acclamations with which he was frequently hailed and encouraged, his men also merited the genial, contented look which he cast over them at the end of each movement.

The programme was such as gave every experienced listener a first rate opportunity to study and compare—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Tchaikowsky's serenade for strings, opus 48, and the Tannhauser overture. From the performance of these works some of the characteristics of Mr. Paur may be confidently deduced. One thing is clear—that he means to have rhythm and accent absolutely preserved, thus securing lucidity of phrase and justness of emphasis. Nor is he satisfied with obtaining this from the most prominent instruments only. He has the skill to realize just what part of the score most needs the help of such presentment at any given moment, and is ready and quick to give the instrument then charged with responsibility its proper production and to require from it the same exactitude as if it stood at the head of the composition. Yet, when he feels that his forces are moving truly and in complete sympathy, his beat becomes very small and slight and sometimes almost ceases for a few bars. He seems to have the disposition towards positive perfection for which Mr. Gericke was distinguished, united to an elasticity and earnestness of temperament sufficient to insure magnetic and dramatic interpretations without verging upon dangerous romanticism. No single observation of the occupant of so difficult a place as his is sufficient for gauging a man and predicating about him exactly; but from this first hearing it seems as if Boston had come nearer to obtaining the thoroughly able and satisfactory conductor than ever before. What he may prove as a maker of programmes, remains to be seen.

His reading of the symphony was conservative and careful—even a little reserved at times; but the minuter details were beautifully marked and presented sharply, but without abruptness; the dynamic gradations were nicely developed and when a climax was reached it was announced with fervor as well as vigor. If any departure from conventionalism were noted, it was to be found in the occasional slight relaxation of time for a bar or two in a transition passage or in a cadence, where, if the melody were sung, the vocalist would naturally linger lightly but not enough to impair the pulsative sense of the tempo. The overture had a large, strongly colored and powerful rendering, but offered as a whole points of excellence rather than of difference. The serenade gave a better suggestion of how Mr. Paur may be expected to treat music of a romantic or fanciful cast. The strings were in fine condition, both for resonance and body of tone and for swift and keen execution, all these qualities being demanded by the composition. The grave introduction had fulness and depth; the elegy (a little longer drawn out) was sweet and smooth; the waltz, with its seductive theme, swayed and poised so languorously as to indicate that Mr. Paur is not too classic to give that rhythm its due; and the finale was worked up with immense vivacity and speed. And when it is added that the hitherto obstreperous and domineering kettle drums were actually played and harmoniously subordinated or indulged, it will be understood that there may now be a good hope for discipline and symmetry in all the orchestra.

In general appearance Mr. Paur does not correspond to such expectations as his pictures must have created; because he is not a dark man, but of a reddish-blond type. He suggested to very many people, both in his manner and his temperament, Mr. Baermann, and it is to be hoped that the season will not pass without his conducting some concert for that eminent pianist, who has been too long absent from the Symphony performances. He is not a graceful conductor, inclining a little toward angularity of beat; but his evident manliness, his strength of purpose, his intelligence, decision, vitality and fineness, so far as they can be estimated so hastily, will atone many score times for any lack of Delsartian curves and statuesque attitudes.

For the second concert this will be the programme: Volkmann's "Richard III." overture; Dvorak's second rhapsody; Schubert's C major symphony, and two arias to be sung by Mme. Nordica.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Ten Concerts on Thursday Evenings.

Oct. 10, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4.

Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

Soloists: Mme. NORDICA, Mr. HEINRICH, Mr. KNEISEL, Mr. SCHULZ and others.

Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of ten concerts, $7.50, now on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

Symphony Rehearsals.

TWO SEATS, also single seat under balcony; low prices. 63 Harrison Avenue, Room A, 9 to 10 A. M.

Symphony Tickets.

HEARD'S TICKET OFFICE, 43 WEST ST.

70
daintiness and lightness might have been welcome in the waltz movement. The Wagner overture was very delightful, the softer sentimental passages being given with especially delightful effect.

It is too soon to express a decided opinion as to Mr Paur's rank among his predecessors, but he has certainly made a splendid beginning for Boston favor.

The program of the next concert is as follows: Volkmann, overture, "Richard III.," Dvorak, rhapsodie No. 2; Schubert, symphony in C major; soloist, Mme Nordica.

THE SYMPHONIES. Journal

The thirteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began last evening, with the interesting, if not exciting, circumstance of the appearance of a new conductor. The organization that is the result of Mr. Higginson's generous impulse and patient fostering is now surely on a firm foundation. It is a public institution that adds abroad a glory to our town; and there is no doubt that the orchestra is appreciated here, although there may be open discussion of the merits and faults of conductors who come and go, fret for an idle day, or are for lasting benefit as musicians and disciplinarians. So let us all welcome the season now begun, and if there be any shaking of the head at the number 13, absit omen!

These weekly concerts are indeed "a sweet boon" to us, as, according to Artemus, the Tower is to London. To many, Saturday evening in winter would not exist without this musical enjoyment, and when there is occasionally a breathing spell, in the absence of the orchestra, the regular goers find time heavy. The theatres are usually crowded Saturday night, and enforced staying at home saddens many victims of the Symphony habit.

Then the appearance of the conductor and the men, the latest gossip concerning some alleged behavior or belief of one of the musicians, the atmospheric condition of the hall, the state of the Saturday evening weather—all these furnish food for conversation at table and in street car for at least two days after the concert. And occasionally there is talk about the music that was played.

This going to Music Hall of a Saturday evening is to many an amusement, a regularly recurring amusement that in certain respects is not unlike dram-drinking. It is a pleasure not without acute excitement, followed, particularly after a long-winded symphony, by a condition of dull lethargy. And yet these good people might be offended seriously, if they were classed as amusement-seekers; they look upon the Symphony concerts as educational, as making for culture. But they might be sorely put to it, if they were required to explain just how and when and where they gained in civilization.

The sense of gratifying a longing for

amusement does not preclude criticism, particularly destructive criticism; nor would it be well perhaps to inquire concerning the foundation for any reasonable criticism to rest upon. Boston is very critical, and it seems occasionally that the only real pleasure of the inhabitants is in the investigation or explanation of this question: Why do we not find pleasure in this or that? It is only at the "Pop" concerts that music is accepted gratefully and sympathetically by the crowd, and there is no doubt that in this case pleasant eating and drinking and smoking pave the way to musical enjoyment.

MR. EMIL PAUR, the new conductor of the symphony Orchestra, is said to be a trustworthy and excellent musician, but hardly a genius. There is comfort in that thought. Of all the varieties of the human "genius" that which assumes an artistic habit is the most exasperating and, specifically, the musical genius is the most unendurable. The competition between the man of talent and the man of genius is a parallel of the race between the tortoise and the hare, and we all know how that contest ended. Your genius is not without his value. He wakes up people, whether they follow him or not; he has the boldness of his convictions and though he may shock us by his defiance of conventionalities he often serves to show that certain forms have lost their significance, while he illustrates the axiom that there is room in the world for everybody who is decent. The exasperation which the genius often engenders is due to his want of catholicity. He shouts for freedom of thought and action, but makes faces at those who think and act otherwise than he lays down for the correct thing. He demands consideration for the new thought, the new form, and has nothing but contempt for all that has gone before. This is not the sort of man to aid in the development of art in this country. Our large assortment of parentage has made us the most cosmopolitan people in the world and we will no more be satisfied with one phase of an art, whether the limner's, the sculptors' or the musician's, than we will consent to an unchanged bill of fare for a month's breakfasts, though the ingredients be never so nicely cooked and dextrously served. We can be easily persuaded to listen to anything, but prohibition of what we want or dictation of what we ought to want will alike breed rebellion. The man of talent holds his ground, for he knows how to be elastic and tactful; the man of genius mars all by his stiffness and impolitic methods.

EVENTS OF A DAY.

Comer

BOSTON GREETES HERR EMIL PAUR AT THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

B. A. A. BICYCLE RACE—CANDIDATE GREEN
HALGE SPEAKS—HARVARD WIPES OUT
WILLIAMS AT FOOTBALL—DINNERS.

The Symphony Orchestra have never played a programme better than they played last night the first of the present season. Indeed, in some respects, they have perhaps never played so well. The rehearsals under Mr. Paur have effected a cordial understanding between him and his men and have established a standard for the maintenance of which they will be held to a strict accountability. Aware, as they could not help being, of the severe but by no means unjust criticism which had been made upon the work of the orchestra in its gradual deterioration under Mr. Nikisch, every man has set himself from the first rehearsal to play for all his worth, in order to assist in proving their right to the praise—always cheerfully accorded them when they did their best—of constituting one of the finest bands in the world. On his part, Mr. Paur, gratified to find an instrument of such strength, ductility and capability for perfect detail under his hand, has been able to use it frankly, without tentatives, reserves, doubts or struggles. The result was splendid, and if the conductor merited the long and loud acclamations with which he was frequently hailed and encouraged, his men also merited the genial, contented look which he cast over them at the end of each movement.

The programme was such as gave every experienced listener a first rate opportunity to study and compare—Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Tchaikowsky's serenade for strings, opus 48, and the Tannhauser overture. From the performance of these works some of the characteristics of Mr. Paur may be confidently deduced. One thing is clear—that he means to have rhythm and accent absolutely preserved, thus securing lucidity of phrase and justness of emphasis. Nor is he satisfied with obtaining this from the most prominent instruments only. He has the skill to realize just what part of the score most needs the help of such presentment at any given moment, and is ready and quick to give the instrument then charged with responsibility its proper production and to require from it the same exactitude as if it stood at the head of the composition. Yet, when he feels that his forces are moving truly and in complete sympathy, his beat becomes very small and slight and sometimes almost ceases for a few bars. He seems to have the disposition towards positive perfection for which Mr. Gericke was distinguished, united to an elasticity and earnestness of temperament sufficient to insure magnetic and dramatic interpretations without verging upon dangerous romanticism. No single observation of the occupant of so difficult a place as his is sufficient for guaging a man and predicating about him exactly; but from this first hearing it seems as if Boston had come nearer to obtaining the thoroughly able and satisfactory conductor than ever before. What he may prove as a maker of programmes, remains to be seen.

His reading of the symphony was conservative and careful—even a little reserved at times; but the minutest details were beautifully marked and presented sharply, but without abruptness; the dynamic gradations were nicely developed and when a climax was reached it was announced with fervor as well as vigor. If any departure from conventionalism were noted, it was to be found in the occasional slight relaxation of time for a bar or two in a transition passage or in a cadence, where, if the melody were sung, the vocalist would naturally linger lightly but not enough to impair the pulsative sense of the tempo. The overture had a large, strongly colored and powerful rendering, but offered as a whole points of excellence rather than of difference. The serenade gave a better suggestion of how Mr. Paur may be expected to treat music of a romantic or fanciful cast. The strings were in fine condition, both for resonance and body of tone and for swift and keen execution, all these qualities being demanded by the composition. The grave introduction had fulness and depth; the elegy (a little longer drawn out) was sweet and smooth; the waltz, with its seductive theme, swayed and poised so languorously as to indicate that Mr. Paur is not too classic to give that rhythm its due; and the finale was worked up with immense vivacity and speed. And when it is added that the hitherto obstreperous and domineering kettle drums were actually played and harmoniously subordinated or indulged, it will be understood that there may now be a good hope for discipline and symmetry in all the orchestra.

In general appearance Mr. Paur does not correspond to such expectations as his pictures must have created; because he is not a dark man, but of a reddish-blond type. He suggested to very many people, both in his manner and his temperament, Mr. Baermann, and it is to be hoped that the season will not pass without his conducting some concert for that eminent pianist, who has been too long absent from the Symphony performances. He is not a graceful conductor, inclining a little toward angularity of beat; but his evident manliness, his strength of purpose, his intelligence, decision, vitality and fineness, so far as they can be estimated so hastily, will atone many score times for any lack of Delsartian curves and statuesque attitudes.

For the second concert this will be the programme: Volkmann's "Richard III." overture; Dvorak's second rhapsody; Schubert's C major symphony, and two arias to be sung by Mme. Nordica.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SANDERS THEATRE, CAMBRIDGE.

BOSTON

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

Ten Concerts on Thursday Evenings.

Oct. 19, Nov. 2, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 4,
Jan. 25, Feb. 15, March 8, April 5, April 26.

Soloists: Mme. NORDICA, Mr. HEINRICH, Mr. KNEISEL, Mr. SCHULZ and others.
Season tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of ten concerts, $7.50, now on sale at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

Symphony Rehearsals.

TWO SEATS, also single seat under balcony; low prices. 63 Harrison Avenue, Room A, 9 to 10 A. M. [A] 117

Symphony Tickets.

HEARD'S TICKET OFFICE, 43 WEST ST. to [A] 26

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

VOLKMANN.	OVERTURE to "Richard III." op. 68.
BEETHOVEN.	RECITATIVE: "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and ARIA: "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio."
DVOŘÁK.	SLAVISCHÉ RHAPSODIE No. 2, in G minor, op. 45
MASSNET.	RECITATIVE: "Celui dont la parole," and AIR: "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Herodiade."
SCHUBERT.	SYMPHONY No. 9, in C major. I. Andante. Allegro, ma non troppo. II. Andante con moto. III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

Soloist:

MME. NORDICA.

The Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to Shakespeare's "Richard III.".....Volkmann Recitative and Air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from
 "Herodiade".....Massenet
 Slavonic Rhapsody No. 2, in G minor, Op. 45
 (First time,).....Dvorak
 Recitative and Aria, Komu Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern, from "Fidelio,".....Beethoven
 Symphony No. 9, in C major.....Schubert

Volkmann's overture "Richard III" bears the opus number 68, and it was published in 1871; his other music to the tragedy, opus 73, was published in 1882 with a poem for concert use. I do not know whether the whole music has ever been given in connection with a performance of the tragedy.

The first performance of this overture at a Boston Symphony concert was Oct. 18, 1884.

This overture is apparently a musical panorama of the life and the death of Richard III. Now, according to historians, there were two Richards.

Many, as the playwright Shakspeare, follow tradition and are of the opinion that he was an unpleasant individual, low of stature, crook-backed, hook-shouldered, splay-footed, goggle-eyed, of swarthy complexion, and with the left arm withered from birth. They also allege that he came into the world with a singularly complete outfit of teeth, nails and hair. His vices were habits: "his cruelty was not casual but natural; and the truth of his mind was only lying and falsehood."

Others, and they are in a decided minority, call Richard an abused man. To some he is that vague entity known as a "perfect gentleman;" and while it is true that he did not invent the kindergarten system, he nevertheless was not a follower of Herod.

Volkmann wrote his music for Shakspeare's play, and Richard is therefore a bogey-man.

There is no programme attached; there is no "hump-motiv," which, like the placard in the street car, invites the audience to "see that hump." Volkmann might have called his overture "Alva" or by the name of any cruel character, for the introduction of the anachronistic "Campbells are Coming" does not identify the music with Richard.

The music is for the most part appropriately saturnine and truculent; it is almost as unbearably gloomy as Rubinstein's "Ivan." It is episodic. And what, pray, has the finale to do with the rest of the overture? Who mourned Richard? Or is the lamentation general, not particular?

There are compositions by Dvorak that seem saturated with Bohemian blood. Others suggest the innumerable dances of Bohemia, from the Ambit to the Zia. Others again bring to mind forests, the open air, gypsy life and gypsy recklessness. This second rhapsody suggests chiefly hard labor.

Schubert never heard his C major symphony. If he had heard it, he might have boiled it down. It was once the fashion to speak of its "divine length," but modern audiences are impatient. Even when it is cut, and the repeats are not observed, it seems interminable; perhaps its peculiar instrumentation, perhaps the monotony of much of the rhythm is the cause. Still, it contains wonderful passages, passages that have not been written in symphonies since the death of Beethoven.

Mr. Paur showed again his great anxiety for the detail, and his work was the result of elaborate preparation. At times he thus produced exceedingly fine effects; and yet, though it may seem a paradoxical statement, his very zeal sometimes brought about apparent crudeness. Thus the beauty of the andante con moto in the symphony was marred by the fact that in order to let a particular instrument sing, the rhythm was almost wholly destroyed. And it may be here remarked again that an andante con moto is not an adagio. But, on the other hand, it may be said that the work of this earnest man will undoubtedly be of benefit to the orchestra; for he demands precision and a rigid observance of gradation of tone.

Mrs. Nordica was heard to best advantage in the air from Massenet's opera, although the air admits easily passion. The air from "Fidelio" was too much for her, for, vocally and in conception, she was not satisfactory.

The programme of the concert of next Saturday is as follows: Symphony, F major, Goetz; Serenade, Volkmann; Beethoven's overture, "Leonore," No. 3.

PHILIP HALE.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Second of the Series in Music Hall
 ---Music Notes.

The second of the concerts by the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall, when the following programme was presented:

Volkmann—Overture to "Richard III.," op. 68.

Beethoven—Recitative and aria, from "Fidelio."

Dvorak—Slavische rhapsodie No. 2, in G minor, op. 45.

Massenet—Recitative and air, from "Herodiade."

Schubert—Symphony No. 9, in C major. Soloist, Mme. Nordica.

The Volkmann overture was interesting from its novelty, for, while it is not new to the patrons of these concerts, it is less familiar than some other selections. It also gave an opportunity of further judging of the methods of Mr. Paur, for the number admits of varied expression and display of musical taste. The overture was given with pleasing effect, particularly the battle scene and the slow movement at the close.

Dvorak's Slavische rhapsodie, a rather gloomy selection, was also pleasantly heard, and the admirable control of the conductor over his forces was shown in more than one instance. Schubert's ninth symphony closed the orchestral numbers. This work is somewhat long and tedious, but is occasionally enjoyed. It was rendered artistically, but was rather heavy food for the spectators after the preceding selections.

Mme. Nordica was the soloist, but she was not in the best voice and several times sang falsely. Her rendering of the selection from "Herodiade" was better than the Beethoven number.

At the concert and rehearsal this week, the programme will be as follows:

H. Goetz—Symphony in F major, op. 9.

Volkmann—Serenade. Solo violoncello,

Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

Beethoven—Overture. "Leonore," No. 3.

SYMPHONY CONCERT, NORDICA.

The second of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, had an especially attractive feature in the appearance of Mme. Nordica, the programme consisting of the following works and selections:

Overture to "Richard III., op. 68. Volkmann
Recitative: "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?"
and aria: "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio," Beethoven
Slavonic rhapsody No. 2, in G minor, op. 45

Recitative: "Celui dont la parole," and air:
"Il est doux, il est bon," from "Herodiade," Massenet
Symphony No. 9, in C major. Schubert

It is apparent that the new conductor has diplomatic tendencies. He evidently proposes to stand upon non-committal ground as to the placing of the symphony, and give even advantage to both those who demand it first and those who are equally positive that it should come last. The hesitations of the adherents who favor the symphony in the middle of the programme may be recognized later on.

Although the great Schubert symphony was put last, it demands first consideration in commenting on the programme, for Mr. Paur fully confirmed all the favorable impressions gained of his ability at his first appearance by his reading of its several movements. He certainly gave this masterly composition a performance eminently in keeping with its grand characteristics, and, without imposing his own individuality, he yet gave a freshness and vigor to his interpretation that was altogether delightful.

The Volkmann overture exhibited the mastery of the conductor over his men in a marked fashion, and the succession of tone pictures which make up the composition were brought out vividly and with a splendid realization of all the wealth of color lavished upon them by the composer. The scenes of strife upon the battlefield could almost be seen, so admirably were the various elements in its construction brought out, and the strong dramatic characteristics of the overture were at all times admirably depicted.

Dvorak's rhapsody had its first hearing here on this occasion and proved an intensely interesting novelty. Its strongly contrasted movements are full of marked originality, both in the themes themselves and their elaboration and treatment, and the dash and fire of the composer's nature shows itself throughout the work. Mr. Paur gave the rhapsody a very brilliant performance and gained a hearty recognition of the merits of the work and its performance.

Mme. Nordica sang with splendid success in the Massenet aria, her nature and gifts as a vocalist appearing to be peculiarly suited to the music of this composer. Her style is so broad and dramatic that she fully realized all the beauties of the aria from "Fidelio," and she gave it with a delightful intelligence and greatly pleased her audience in both her appearance.

It is worthy of note that Mr. Paur extended the courtesy of an escort to the singer upon her entrance and departure, a courtesy that has been sadly neglected by his predecessors.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Second Symphony Orchestra Program—Tavary English Opera Company—Concerts, Etc.

The second Symphony program contained one novelty, Dvorak's Slavonic rhapsody No. 2, which was given here for the first time. The remaining numbers were Volkmann's overture to "Richard III.," Schubert's ninth symphony, and the vocal solos from Massenet's "Herodiade" and Beethoven's "Fidelio," sung by Mme. Nordica.

No American singer is more popular in this city than Nordica, and her receptions at the rehearsal and concert were enough to inspire the artist to her best efforts. She sang superbly. Salome's aria was given with beautiful devotional fervor and artistic power, and was in marked contrast to the dramatic scene from "Fidelio." The latter was interpreted with notable purity of tone and dramatic expression, the notes of the upper register electrifying her auditors and eliciting several recalls to the platform. It may as well be noted here that Mr. Paur complimented the fair soloist by escorting her to her position on the stage.

Mr. Emil Paur conducted the orchestra in a manner which should receive commendation from all music lovers, although he almost ignored the thousands of listeners in the hall, and paid attention to the performers. His manner evidently inspires confidence in the men, for his directing is firm and decisive, and he does not leave them in doubt about tempos and cues.

Dvorak's rhapsody, one of those hurly-burly Slavonic pieces for which this composer is noted, shows the individuality of the man unmistakably, and it was given with the vigor, dash and dissonance necessary for the effects intended by the writer. Volkmann's overture showed no indications of new readings or interpretations differing from previous performances. It was smoothly given.

Schubert's grand ninth symphony was played with nearly all the repeats. The length and importance of this number should place it at the beginning of concert programs, for few can appreciate the manifold beauties and thoroughly enjoy the composition after a long symphonic feast has preceded a performance of this work.

The wind instruments, which play so prominent a part throughout, were effectively used, although the brasses at times were unnecessarily harsh and seemingly eluded the vigilance of the conductor's eye. The finale was magnificently played. Those who looked for startling innovations in Mr. Paur's readings were disappointed. The conductor interprets his composers with an evident determination to illustrate their ideas as near as possible.

This week's program will be: Symphony in F major, op. 9, H. Goetz; serenade, Volkmann, solo violin and cello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven.

MUSIC. Gardner

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, last night, was, Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," rhapsodie No. 2, "Dvorak," (first time); aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio," and Schubert's Symphony in C. Mme. Nordica was the soloist. The house was filled to overflowing. A further acquaintance into the conducting of Mr. Paur, developed little, if anything more, than was obtained by our first experience. He is undoubtedly sincerely painstaking, and scrupulously conscientious in his work, so much so, perhaps, as to be almost pedagogic in his scrupulous anxiety for exactness. Every point, important and otherwise, is elaborated with such minute and demonstrative care, that at times, it nearly becomes oppressive, and causes one to wish for something less of rigidity, and something more in freedom of swing. Then, too, there is such an excess of gesticulation on the part of Mr. Paur, especially in indicating to the different players when it is time to "come in," that it distracts attention from the music. Surely, he has an orchestra of intelligent, experienced, and competent players, who are rehearsed sedulously during the week, and who, therefore, by the time that the performance takes place, may be presumed to know exactly what the conductor expects from them. Hence, it seems superfluous that there should be so much waving of the baton, as if they were playing prima vista; when a glance of the eye or a slight nod of the head would be sufficient indication as a cue. Mr. Paur's readings are eminently thoughtful, but as yet have been dry and lacking in the desired effect of spontaneity. However, the freedom from trickery, the artistic sincerity, and the frank honesty that manifestly underlie the impulses of the conductor, entitle him to the most respectful consideration. Perhaps, when we shall have seen more of him, we shall lose the impression that we now have regarding his tendency to over-elaborate his readings by emphasizing every possible point, and thus giving a disjointed effect to the music; and regarding also, his lack of a certain grace of poetic feeling. The music does not flow, but moves haltingly, under his method of interpreting it. It would seem as if he desired to treat an orchestra as a solo instrument; but it is too unwieldy to bear such treatment, which deprives it of its characteristic dignity. Not that he himself is wanting in dignity, but that conscientiousness may be pushed too far, to say nothing of the effect of heavy, didactic pedantry that it may produce. The Volkmann overture had been heard here before, when it made no very marked impression. It was broadly and effectively given, but with such an excess in finish of detail, that it seemed longer than ever before, and more tiresome. The Dvorak Rhapsodie was very like the other music we have had from the same composer, so like in fact, that notwithstanding it was given on this occasion for the first time, it seemed to us as if we were thoroughly familiar with it. There is not much that is interesting in it, and it is abundant in the now, almost conventional groping in the dark for something that is never found. The orchestration is often very rich, and sometimes thrilling for the moment, in its vigorous massiveness. It was read and played with all possible effect, but it did not seem to meet with a very favorable reception. If it had anything to say that was imperatively called for, we did not discover what it was. Variety in style and expressiveness does not seem to be among Dvorak's gifts. The symphony was carefully read. The tempi were admirable, except when now and then there was a slackening of the movement whenever a phase appeared that might be made to take a sentimental aspect. However, on the whole it was a spirited and honest rendering of the work. Madame Nordica, who was gorgeously costumed, was welcomed with hearty fervor. She sang the Massenet air, "Il est doux," tastefully, tunefully, and with grace and finish of technique, though perhaps somewhat rigidly and coldly in point of style. In this selection, Mr. Paur gave the most satisfying evidence of his skill that he had hitherto vouchsafed. It was delightfully flexible, and was the perfection of conducting the accompaniments to vocal music; and in the Beethoven air, which was the "Abscheulicher," he was equally successful and satisfying. Mme. Nordica was less pleasing in her interpretation of this air than she was in her earlier contribution to the concert. Her style is hardly dramatic enough to do it justice, and she was clearly overweighted by it. Her execution of it was clean cut, and, for a high voice, she took the lower notes with remarkable volume and clearness; but the aria makes exactions, for its proper interpretation, which are beyond her powers to meet. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in F, Goetz; Serenade, for cello and orchestra, Volkmann; Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday was broad and varied enough to suit any exacting auditor; it contained much of the dramatic element, and the Slavonic vein of the Dvorak rhapsody found a good counterpoise in the Hungarian flavor of Schubert's great symphony in C major. That this dramatic element was always fully brought out cannot be said, but there was not a measure in the concert that was slovenly, and every thought was so clearly expressed that the intention of the composer was always easily followed.

The Volkmann overture ("Richard III.") began somewhat too deliberately; one cannot imagine a phlegmatic Duke of Gloster. From the beginning of the battle, however, all went well, and there was adequate power and vehemence; the fanfares rang out with martial effect, and the shock of combat was portrayed with appropriate fire. The old Scotch tune of "The Campbells are Comin'" was given crisply and established the warlike atmosphere, in spite of its being dragged in by the composer about a century too soon. Not only did Volkmann err in calling this "an old English war song," but he committed the strangest of anachronisms, for the battle of Bosworth was fought in 1485, while the Scotch tune was not written until 1608; but music, heavenly maid, is not to be fettered by dates.

After the overture came the attraction

SYMPHONY CONCERT, NORDICA.

The second of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, had an especially attractive feature in the appearance of Mme. Nordica, the programme consisting of the following works and selections:

Overture to "Richard III.," op. 68, Volkmann
Recitative: "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and aria: "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio," Beethoven
Slavische Rhapsodie No. 2, in G minor, op. 45

Recitative: "Celui dont la parole," and air: "Hesitons, il est bon," from "Herodiade," Massenet
Symphony No. 9, in C major, Schubert

It is apparent that the new conductor has diplomatic tendencies. He evidently proposes to stand upon non-committal ground as to the placing of the symphony, and give even advantage to both those who demand it first and those who are equally positive that it should come last. The He-schel adherents who favor the symphony in the middle of the programme may be recognized later on.

Although the great Schubert symphony was put last, it demands first consideration in commenting on the programme, for Mr. Paur fully confirmed all the favorable impressions gained of his ability at his first appearance by his reading of its several movements. He certainly gave this masterly composition a performance eminently in keeping with its grand characteristics, and, without imposing his own individuality, he yet gave a freshness and vigor to his interpretation that was altogether delightful.

The Volkmann overture exhibited the mastery of the conductor over his men in a marked fashion, and the succession of tone pictures which make up the composition were brought out vividly and with a splendid realization of all the wealth of color lavished upon them by the composer. The scenes of strife upon the battlefield could almost be seen, so admirably were the various elements in its construction brought out, and the strong dramatic characteristics of the overture were at all times admirably depicted.

Dvorak's rhapsody had its first hearing here on this occasion and proved an intensely interesting novelty. Its strongly contrasted movements are full of marked originality, both in the themes themselves and their elaboration and treatment, and the dash and fire of the composer's nature shows itself throughout the work. Mr. Paur gave the rhapsody a very brilliant performance and gained a hearty recognition of the merits of the work and its performance.

Mme. Nordica sang with splendid success in the Massenet aria, her nature and gifts as a vocalist appearing to be peculiarly suited to the music of this composer. Her style is so broad and dramatic that she fully realized all the beauties of the aria from "Fidelio," and she gave it with a delightful intelligence and greatly pleased her audience in both her appearances.

It is worthy of note that Mr. Paur extended the courtesy of an escort to the singer upon her entrance and departure, a courtesy that has been sadly neglected by his predecessors.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Second Symphony Orchestra Program — Tavary English Opera Company — Concerts, Etc.

The second Symphony program contained one novelty, Dvorak's Slavonic rhapsody No. 2, which was given here for the first time. The remaining numbers were Volkmann's overture to "Richard III.," Schubert's ninth symphony, and the vocal solos from Massenet's "Herodiade" and Beethoven's "Fidelio," sung by Mme. Nordica.

No American singer is more popular in this city than Nordica, and her receptions at the rehearsal and concert were enough to inspire the artist to her best efforts. She sang superbly. Salome's aria was given with beautiful devotional fervor and artistic power, and was in marked contrast to the dramatic scene from "Fidelio." The latter was interpreted with notable purity of tone and dramatic expression, the notes of the upper register electrifying her auditors and eliciting several recalls to the platform. It may as well be noted here that Mr. Paur complimented the fair soloist by escorting her to her position on the stage.

Mr. Emil Paur conducted the orchestra in a manner which should receive commendation from all music lovers, although he almost ignored the thousands of listeners in the hall, and paid attention to the performers. His manner evidently inspires confidence in the men, for his directing is firm and decisive, and he does not leave them in doubt about tempos and cues.

Dvorak's rhapsody, one of those hurly-burly Slavonic pieces for which this composer is noted, shows the individuality of the man unmistakably, and it was given with the vigor, dash and dissonance necessary for the effects intended by the writer. Volkmann's overture showed no indications of new readings or interpretations differing from previous performances. It was smoothly given.

Schubert's grand ninth symphony was played with nearly all the repeats. The length and importance of this number should place it at the beginning of concert programs, for few can appreciate the manifold beauties and thoroughly enjoy the composition after a long symphonic feast has preceded a performance of this work.

The wind instruments, which play so prominent a part throughout, were effectively used, although the brasses at times were unnecessarily harsh and seemingly eluded the vigilance of the conductor's eye. The finale was magnificently played. Those who looked for startling innovations in Mr. Paur's readings were disappointed. The conductor interprets his composers with an evident determination to illustrate their ideas as near as possible.

This week's program will be: Symphony in F major, op. 9, H. Goetz; serenade, Volkmann, solo violoncello, Mr. Alwin Schroeder; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven.

MUSIC. Gazette

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, last night, was, Overture, "Richard III.," Volkmann; aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," rhapsodie No. 2, "Dvorak," (first time); aria from Beethoven's "Fidelio," and Schubert's Symphony in C. Mme. Nordica was the soloist. The house was filled to overflowing. A further acquaintance into the conducting of Mr. Paur, developed little, if anything more, than was obtained by our first experience. He is undoubtedly sincerely painstaking, and scrupulously conscientious in his work, so much so, perhaps, as to be almost pedagogic in his scrupulous anxiety for exactness. Every point, important and otherwise, is elaborated with such minute and demonstrative care, that at times, it nearly becomes oppressive, and causes one to wish for something less of rigidity, and something more in freedom of swing. Then, too, there is such an excess of gesticulation on the part of Mr. Paur, especially in indicating to the different players when it is time to "come in," that it distracts attention from the music. Surely, he has an orchestra of intelligent, experienced, and competent players, who are rehearsed sedulously during the week, and who, therefore, by the time that the performance takes place, may be presumed to know exactly what the conductor expects from them. Hence, it seems superfluous that there should be so much waving of the baton, as if they were playing prima vista; when a glance of the eye or a slight nod of the head would be sufficient indication as a cue. Mr. Paur's readings are eminently thoughtful, but as yet have been dry and lacking in the desired effect of spontaneity. However, the freedom from trickery, the artistic sincerity, and the frank honesty that manifestly underlie the impulses of the conductor, entitle him to the most respectful consideration. Perhaps, when we shall have seen more of him, we shall lose the impression that we now have regarding his tendency to over-elaborate his readings by emphasizing every possible point, and thus giving a disjointed effect to the music; and regarding also, his lack of a certain grace of poetic feeling. The music does not flow, but moves haltingly, under his method of interpreting it. It would seem as if he desired to treat an orchestra as a solo instrument; but it is too unwieldy to bear such treatment, which deprives it of its characteristic dignity. Not that he himself is wanting in dignity, but that conscientiousness may be pushed too far, to say nothing of the effect of heavy, didactic pedantry that it may produce. The Volkmann overture had been heard here before, when it made no very marked impression. It was broadly and effectively given, but with such an excess in finish of detail, that it seemed longer than ever before, and more tiresome. The Dvorak Rhapsodie was very like the other music we have had from the same composer, so like in fact, that notwithstanding it was given on this occasion for the first time, it seemed to us as if we were thoroughly familiar with it. There is not much that is interesting in it, and it is abundant in the now, almost conventional groping in the dark for something that is never found. The orchestration is often very rich, and sometimes thrilling for the moment, in its vigorous massiveness. It was read and played with all possible effect, but it did not seem to meet with a very favorable reception. If it had anything to say that was imperatively called for, we did not discover what it was. Variety in style and expressiveness does not seem to be among Dvorak's gifts. The symphony was carefully read. The tempi were admirable, except when now and then there was a slackening of the movement whenever a phase appeared that might be made to take a sentimental aspect. However, on the whole it was a spirited and honest rendering of the work. Madame Nordica, who was gorgeously costumed, was welcomed with hearty fervor. She sang the Massenet air, "Il est doux," tastefully, tunelessly, and with grace and finish of technique, though perhaps somewhat rigidly and coldly in point of style. In this selection, Mr. Paur gave the most satisfying evidence of his skill that he had hitherto vouchsafed. It was delightfully flexible, and was the perfection of conducting the accompaniments to vocal music; and in the Beethoven air, which was the "Abscheulicher," he was equally successful and satisfying. Mme. Nordica was less pleasing in her interpretation of this air than she was in her earlier contribution to the concert. Her style is hardly dramatic enough to do it justice, and she was clearly overweighted by it. Her execution of it was clean cut, and, for a high voice, she took the lower notes with remarkable volume and clearness; but the aria makes exactions, for its proper interpretation, which are beyond her powers to meet. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony in F, Goetz; Serenade, for cello and orchestra, Volkmann; Overture, "Leonore," No. 3, Beethoven. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday was broad and varied enough to suit any exacting auditor; it contained much of the dramatic element, and the Slavonic vein of the Dvorak rhapsody found a good counterpoise in the Hungarian flavor of Schubert's great symphony in C major. That this dramatic element was always fully brought out cannot be said, but there was not a measure in the concert that was slovenly, and every thought was so clearly expressed that the intention of the composer was always easily followed.

The Volkmann overture ("Richard III.") began somewhat too deliberately; one cannot imagine a phlegmatic Duke of Gloster. From the beginning of the battle, however, all went well, and there was adequate power and vehemence; the fanfares rang out with martial effect, and the shock of combat was portrayed with appropriate fire. The old Scotch tune of "The Campbells are Comin'" was given crisply and established the warlike atmosphere, in spite of its being dragged in by the composer about a century too soon. Not only did Volkmann err in calling this "an old English war song," but he committed the strangest of anachronisms, for the battle of Bosworth was fought in 1485, while the Scotch tune was not written until 1568; but music, heavenly maid, is not to be fettered by dates.

After the overture came the attraction

78
which had crowded the hall to repletion—Madame Nordica. The famous air from Massenet's "Hérodiade" ("Il est Doux, il est Bon") suited her style well, yet there was not entire satisfaction in her work, for there seemed to be more of effort in her singing than is usual, and in the high note of the climax there was aberration from pitch, which was also perceptible in the finale of the Beethoven aria given later in the concert. The aria by Leonora from "Fidelio" was, however, sung with much intelligence and its dramatic contrasts well preserved, even if the Materna or Lehmann standard was not attained. Applause, recalls and floral tributes followed the conclusion of the numbers, as a matter of course.

To return to our orchestral topic,—the Slavonic rhapsody by Dvorak was the weak spot of the programme; it is not, in itself, the strongest of works, but its almost Oriental caprice may not be treated as a Beethoven development; the sharpest of contrasts, the freest of tempi, might have been used here. Just this high-flavored modern school has been given, with extraordinary abandon in our concerts for years past, and it is difficult to accustom oneself to a less vivid interpretation. It gave every department of the orchestra an opportunity to display itself, even to muted horns with baleful and ugly tones, and the delicate harp. Our new conductor may break through his reserve in works such as these.

The finest of the Schubert symphonies ended the programme. In every measure the C major symphony shows that Schubert thought vocally; musical ideas come into the mind of a composer through some definite media of tone; thus Schumann thought piano, and one hears the piano even in his great orchestral poems; Beethoven always had the orchestra in his mind's eye, and even his sonatas and string quartettes suggest the orchestra; but Schubert's musical fancies were linked to the human voice, and whether it be a piano work, a string quartette or a symphony, one hears a set of beautiful songs without much thematic development such as would befit an instrumental work. The fact that the development is slight and the themes very striking, may be a full justification for Mr. Paur's omitting the repeat in the performance, before the development. The consensus of modern musical thought is against the repetitions which our forefathers bore with exemplary patience. It may be that in the near future the repeat of the first three divisions (the themes before development) of a sonata-movement may be abolished even in Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven.

The introduction to the symphony was taken quicker than is usual. The horn-player gave his theme without blemish, and the orchestra took it up with good ensemble. The "non troppo" of the chief theme seemed to be disregarded, and it went at a flying pace but clearly throughout. The coda of this movement was splendidly played, especially in the important trombone phrases, which cross each other like the clash of swords. Never was a sterner dialogue written between tenor and base trombones; one can recall a time years ago when the phrases were repressed until they became mere horn passages, but it was not so on this occasion. If ever there was a wood-wind symphony this was one, and the oboe is almost continually in the foreground; it was splendidly played in this work, especially in the second and fourth movements. Not less commendable was the clarinette work, which abounds with important phrases, amounting to obbligato passages.

There were some notably fine points of reading in the symphony; the powerful crescendo just preceding the awe-inspiring pause (a startling rest of one measure) in the second movement was well worked up, and the cello work after it was finely given too; the scherzo was brilliant throughout, but the finale was the crowning effect, for here the conductor threw reserve to the winds, and the fanfares which began the movement sounded like the approach of a victorious army, the chief theme was as brilliant as one could wish (the first violins showed their mettle here), and when it came to those mighty four strokes of the full orchestra, that amazing picture of massive power, picturesque because of its very monotony, titanic in its constant reiteration, the climax of the concert was reached. This movement abundantly proved that it is not to be King Log after King Stork, in our orchestral matters, but one could wish such moments of fire and enthusiasm to come more frequently. Perhaps they will, after conductor and orchestra have fully formed acquaintance.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the second Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Volkmann: Overture to "Richard III.," Opus 68.
Beethoven: Recitative, "Abscheulicher! wo eilst du hin?" and Aria, "Komm Hoffnung, lass den letzten Stern," from "Fidelio."
Dvorak: Slavische Rhapsodie No. 2, in G minor, Opus 45.
Massenet: Recitative, "Celui dont la parole," and Air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Hérodiade."
Schubert: Symphony No. 9, in C major.
Mme. Nordica was the singer.

The hall was crowded, the side aisles being filled with people standing; we can hardly remember a season that began so early with full houses. And the large audience was generally enthusiastic, too, especially over Mme. Nordica's singing.

The performance of Volkmann's "Richard III." overture showed both conductor and orchestra in the finest light; never before have we heard so much meaning given this overture. It is essentially a dramatic composition, one in which vehemence of expression and picturesque suggestiveness far outweigh what of musical form and development there may be in it. Mr. Paur takes it in a strongly dramatic way, giving its vehemence and dramatic coloring their full value, but without loss of musical distinctness and coherence. The slow introduction and all the "Bosworth Field" business near the middle of the work produced a very striking effect, and the serene mood of the peroration made a fine contrast with what had preceded it; indeed, Mr. Paur's reading of these closing measures in F-sharp major was exceedingly beautiful and expressive; one could well fancy them a musical rendering of Richmond's.

"Proclaim a pardon to the soldiers fled,
That in submission will return to us;
And then, as we have ta'en the sacrament,
We will unite the white rose and the red—Smile heaven upon this fair conjunction!"
That long hath frown'd upon their enmity!

In a word, this is the first time we have found the overture otherwise than tiresome and weak; Mr. Paur has shown it to us as a poetically imaginative composition wanting neither in coherency nor dramatic force. The orchestra played it magnificently.

In the Dvorak Slavonic Rhapsody we must confess ourselves as sadly disappointed, after the enthusiastic way we had heard it spoken of by members of the orchestra and others who knew it. We cannot see that the work rises above the general level of a Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody; and, though parts of it have undeniably a certain warm emotional charm—an element not uncommon with Dvorak—this hardly makes up for the absence of Liszt's brilliancy and his peculiar touch of genius. The Czech melodies on which it is founded seem to appeal to one more by their quaint, exotic flavor than by their musical beauty, and the construction of the work is as slight and loose-jointed as may be. One point, however, may be spoken of with genuine enthusiasm: the orchestration. Here Dvorak has even surpassed himself; the scoring is not only rich and euphonious, but varied and full of individual aroma. The performance was admirable.

With the Schubert symphony Mr. Paur came upon more ticklish ground. The great work is familiar to all of us; we have been brought up on it, and know its every turning. The orchestra played for the most part splendidly; here Mr. Paur gave good earnest of what he can do as a disciplinarian. Apart from a slip or two in individual solo instruments, such as cannot be laid to the conductor's charge, the performance left little to be desired in a technical way; vigor and precision of attack, excellence of dynamic balance, and a fine blending of the various voices of the orchestra, were the rule; it was a real pleasure to hear the wind instruments make their entries together so evenly and cleanly. Neither was there any lack of fire and expressiveness. Still, it was stretching a point to call the performance of the glorious work an effective one.

To us, at least, Mr. Paur's reading of each one of the four movements seemed to lack totality of conception; there was an immense deal of attention paid to (would-be) effective details, but very little strong general effectiveness. Mr. Paur follows the favorite modern plan of changing the tempo very often, as the character and expression of the music changes; and it must be admitted that his modifications are not excessive in degree, compared with similar things we have heard here before; in fact, he is rather moderate in this matter than otherwise. But somehow his frequent changes have a disturbing effect upon the listener; they continually rouse you out of the mood into which the music has thrown you; they distract your attention from the composition, instead of riveting it still more firmly upon it. If ever there were a long symphonic composition in which the element of strongly marked and pregnant rhythm predominated, this symphony of Schubert's is that one; it and Beethoven's seventh may be called the "dance symphonies" par excellence. Each movement has its own well-defined rhythmic character, and adheres to this character with singular persistency. Of course there are marked rhythmic contrasts; the second theme in the first movement, for instance, is in an utterly different rhythm from the first; a more striking rhythmic contrast than that between the Trio and the Scherzo could hardly be desired. But each theme sticks to and emphasizes its own particular rhythm with great pertinacity throughout its whole development and working out; there is none of that successive presentation of the same theme under various rhythmic aspects that one finds in many more modern compositions. The general aspect of each one of the four movements is one of striking continuity; there is exceedingly little fitfulness of mood, but the music goes on and on, straight toward its goal, with but few interruptions. Now, Mr. Paur's very frequent changes of tempo sadly break up this splendid continuity and make a too merely kaleidoscopic impression; each change, as it comes about, throws cold water upon the enthusiasm aroused by the preceding phrase, instead of egging that enthusiasm on to a higher and ever warmer pitch; the whole effect may be described as that of a perpetual benumbing over again. We will not say that Mr. Paur's tempo did not in every case (with one important exception) fit the particular phrase to which he applied it to a nicety; take each separate phrase by itself, and Mr. Paur's tempo for it was perfectly comprehensible. But it did sever the bond which bound that phrase to its neighbor, and all totality of impression was lost.

The exception to which we have referred was the last movement, almost the whole of which went incomprehensibly slow. This movement has always stood in our mind as a sort of celestial counterpart of Berlioz's "Ride to the Abyss" in the "Damnation de Faust;" it might be called, by analogy, a Ride to the Emyrean. Apart from the intrinsic beauty of its themes, the enormous effect it produces comes from two characteristics—velocity and persistency. It goes like the wind; it is full of ideal galloping, express-train clinkety-clink; anything you please that is associated with speed. That persistent violin figure in the accompaniment means speed, and nothing but speed; and, by the way, this same figure is by no means easy to play at Mr. Paur's slow tempo; it takes consummate virtuosity to make a bow "jump" as slow as that! Now, Mr. Paur seems to do all in his power to knock this idea of speed in the head, and to substitute for it the idea of weight—weight of tone, weight of movement, weight of emphasis. We cannot but think this distorts the movement from its true character.

Mme. Nordica sang the air from Massenet's "Hérodiade" in admirable style and with a purity of feeling very different from the over-sensuous passionateness some singers are too prone to infuse into the piece; we have often heard the air sung with a fervor of passion that might lead the suspiciously inclined to question whether the young Salomé's feelings toward the Prophet were not an exemplification of one of the most regrettable phases of "curatolatry." Mme. Nordica, on the other hand, sang it with just the right pure expression. In the over-great "Abscheulicher!" too, she did much that was signally fine; perhaps the scene still overweighs her powers a little—whose does it not?—but she made some exceedingly strong points in it, and her conception of the music is excellent. She was enthusiastically applauded and recalled after both humbers.

80

THE SECOND SYMPHONY.

Director Paur Cordially Welcomed by a Large Audience.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening before an audience that occupied every seat and bit of standing room. Mr. Paur was cordially welcomed when he appeared. The programme was as follows: Overture "Richard III." Volkmann; aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; Rhapsody No. 2, Dvorak; aria from "Fidelio," Beethoven; Symphony in C Major, Schubert. Mrs. Lillian Nordica was the vocalist.

The Volkmann overture has been played at these concerts twice by Mr. Gericke and once by Mr. Nikisch. Some one has said that this overture is a "darkly colored and bloodthirsty work, full of relentless and heathenish gloom"—and this estimate is a fair one. Of course there are brilliant passages in the orchestration, but, regardless of this and a few other items of interest, it is, on the whole, tedious and hardly worth the repetitions it has received. To present such a work once is a duty due so able a composer as Volkmann, and one must be thankful for the opportunity of hearing it also.

The Dvorak Rhapsody was played here for the first time, as far as I am informed, and is either labored in its composition or else was played in a heavy, inflexible manner; I think the former was the principal difficulty, for although the scoring in the main is masterly, and there are many happy effects, still it failed to be satisfactory in its effort, and did not please the audience. Dvorak often misses the mark as regards a definite purpose in his compositions.

In the playing of the Schubert Symphony there was somewhat of disappointment, when the results obtained at the first concert are remembered. There was overmuch rasping of the strings, and the brass was overloud and harsh a large part of the time. As for the wood-wind, which was used with so much discretion at the previous concert, on this occasion it was too loud and served often in destroying the delightful effect of the strings, when at times the latter played with delicacy. Take the Andante con moto, for instance. Not once did the wood-wind produce a pianissimo, or hardly a piano, either. Most of the numerous passages which should have been pianissimos were given mezzo-forte, not a bit softer, hence much of the delicacy and sentiment of the movement was lost, and the ending of the movement, which should melt away to a mere breath, was ruined in effect because of the indiscreet efforts of the wind instruments. Many places could be enumerated, did space allow, where the wood-wind spoiled the effect with its overloud playing. What use for the strings to delicately touch a passage if the wind instruments, which should be equally subdued, blow in a loud manner. Unless Mr. Paur restrains his brass more and obliges the wood-wind to discriminate in dynamics and be more refined in quality of tone, the orchestra will soon sink to that state of coarseness in its efforts that has characterized its playing for the past four seasons. There were finely obtained effects during the playing of the symphony and some exaggerated contrasts, but on the whole the work was roughly played, and in saying this the nobility of the work is remembered and the necessity for a full, sonorous and virile tone in many passages is recognized.

Mr. Paur showed earnestness in his work and kept the time rigidly in hand. He also is to be commended for the rapidity with which he took the movements and for the omission of repeats. He began the opening at a moderate pace, and many must have feared that if that was to be the index of his conception, then indeed was a most tedious task before them. When he began the allegro, ma non troppo, however, he took it in so spirited a manner that all doubts were removed and one became at ease again as regards the tempo.

Of Mrs. Nordica's singing, much praise must be given for her rendering of the Massenet aria. She was not so happy, however, in the Beethoven aria, for she seemed to be overweighed with its dramatic demands. She failed to bring out the upward scale in the latter part of the air that makes at its climax such a wonderful effect. Generally speaking, Mrs. Nordica used her lovely voice with discretion. It is to be regretted that she is to take part in some performances of Wagner's trilogy, for there is danger that her delicate and beautiful voice may be injured, if not ruined thereby.

Mr. Paur directed the accompaniments in a commendable manner. It should be recorded also that courtesy and politeness are a part of his manners, for he assisted the singer during her entrances and exits. Can any one remember when any lady artist has been so honored during the past four seasons? The concert was a little long; a shorter symphony would have served better on this occasion. Next Saturday, Goetz's symphony in F major, op. 9, will be given and Mr. Schroeder will play the serenade by Volkmann, for cello. Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3, will complete the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE SYMPHONY AND OTHER CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

If, as was said here a week ago, the initial concert of the current Symphony series was an exceptionally fine first performance, certainly the concert of last evening will be accepted as following worthily that excellent lead.

It is too soon, of course, to talk about perfection. The understanding between the conductor and his four-score men seems to be of the best; for, when one catches a glimpse of his face, one sees sympathy and approval in the look it wears, while the musicians say that they like his treatment of them and the music and mean to support him. But as yet there must necessarily be something tentative in what he and they do, and this double anxiety of itself militates against entire ease and smoothness. The brass instruments have not yet learned to attack a phrase all together as one voice, the first violins still incline occasionally to take the lead even when it is not their turn, and the tone color is somewhat spotty here and there, while some phrasing is stiff and cautious.

But the conductor's plan seems to be all right—to work not for himself, but for the music and the musicians. He seems intent on giving the author his clearest possible light; preserving for each component of the score its proper place; insuring its own fair chance for every instrument; encouraging and stimulating the players, but depending on them for the personal enthusiasm which will make the life, spirit, warmth and sentiment of the readings come finally from them, as it should. Those of us who sit in front and see only Mr. Paur's back and the movements of his arms, may judge him to be a little dry and formal; but the orchestra themselves speak of him as no less energizing than manly, a conductor who will, they think, move them to do their best and stand behind them strongly, like a good general, while they are doing it. And they hint that a solid fortnight longer will be needed to get the great machine running smoothly and with its proper power and piancy.

The second programme took more time than the first, for it included the tremendously long C-major symphony of Schubert, which would have been better assigned to an evening when the participation of a vocalist did not make five numbers necessary. The other instrumental works were Volkmann's dramatic "Richard the Third" overture, so gloomy and almost gruesome in its moody introduction, so furious and noisy in its battle pictures, and so melancholy in the short conclusion which follows the conflict, and the second Rhapsody of Dvorak. This latter was new to Boston, and on this first hearing seemed to substantiate its title. It is almost a tone-picture, as the phrase goes, being a series of wandering and yet connected episodes derived principally from a pleasant phrase presented, after a couple of clamorous chords, by a few voices from the wooden wind. Rhythm, time and accent change constantly, and no choir long holds the predominance. But for the strong sense of unity which binds these episodes so that each seems to be in its proper place as a consequent and a cause, one might almost set down the work among improvisations. It has more interest than positive character, perhaps, and will be made welcome as an occasional visitor rather than as a constant friend.

81

The management of these three works has been already implied in our opening paragraph. It was firm, intellectual, earnest, fair-minded and forceful, with no little delicacy and elasticity, giving much pleasure at the time and in recollection and promising well for the future.

Mme. Nordica sang—with orchestral accompaniment—Salome's large sweet air from Massenet's "Herodiade" and Leonora's great scene in Beethoven's "Fidelio." The former had grace and refinement and the latter had honest strength and sincerity. Mme. Nordica is a dramatic, but not a passionate singer, and she wisely refrained from attempting to put intensity into the Beethoven recitative, and depended chiefly for her effect upon the gentleness and quiet firmness of the air. She was in excellent voice and mood, sang generously and freely and was recalled several times. It was pleasant to see that Mr. Paur, unlike Mr. Nikisch, brought some good manners with him, and escorted his soloist from the ante-room to the platform.

Mr. Kneisel was absent from his place and Mr. Loeffler led the first violins.

The next programme stands thus. Goetz's F major symphony; a serenade by Volkmann, Mr. Schroeder playing the cello solo, and Beethoven's overture "Leonora, No. 3."

CYNICISMS.

I wonder what impression the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra will make. I do not mean what the public and the critics will think of him, but what effect he will have on the more youthful femininity that glorify the rehearsals. It seems that Mr. Paur is a blonde. He is the first who has wielded a baton over the orchestra. The others were of a different complexion. This should be in his favor, as a mere matter of change. However, all will depend on the girls. I wonder if they will forget the allegiance they swore to Mr. Nikisch when he was new to them; how they admired the poetic pallor of his countenance, and were fascinated by the whiteness of his hands when they protruded beyond the extensive shirt cuffs that he affected. I think, too, that they felt drawn toward him by the fact that he appeared to be in ill health, and that the prevailing expression of his face was one of profound melancholy. It is true that they never saw him when he was drinking lager beer or playing poker, but that was only so much in his favor. I cannot say that I admired him very greatly as a conductor, but I had a sincere admiration for him in his aspect as a poseur. There can be no question that he had talent in a certain way, as a musician, but he was gifted with positive genius for posing. I remember when he first came here the members of the orchestra were delighted with him. They hailed him as a welcome change from the stern discipline of his predecessor, Gericke, as they hailed the latter as a vast improvement on his predecessor, Henschel. In Nikisch there was nothing of Henschel's lack of camaraderie, or of Gericke's dignified stiffness. In fact, the men were charmed with him. By and by, however, this feeling of enthusiasm dimmed, and then dissipated. If I were it with just the right pure expression. In the ever-great "Abscheulicher!" too, she did much that was signally fine: perhaps the scene still overweighs her powers a little—whose does it not?—but she made some exceedingly strong points in it, and her conception of the music is excellent. She was enthusiastically applauded and recalled after both humbers.

80

THE SECOND SYMPHONY.

Director Paur Cordially Welcomed by a Large Audience.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening before an audience that occupied every seat and bit of standing room. Mr. Paur was cordially welcomed when he appeared. The programme was as follows: Overture "Richard III." Volkmann; aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; Rhapsody No. 2, Dvorak; aria from "Fidelio," Beethoven; Symphony in C Major, Schubert. Mrs. Lillian Nordica was the vocalist.

The Volkmann overture has been played at these concerts twice by Mr. Gericke and once by Mr. Nikisch. Some one has said that this overture is a "darkly colored and bloodthirsty work, full of relentless and heathenish gloom,"—and this estimate is a fair one. Of course there are brilliant passages in the orchestration, but, regardless of this and a few other items of interest, it is, on the whole, tedious and hardly worth the repetitions it has received. To present such a work once is a duty due so able a composer as Volkmann, and one must be thankful for the opportunity of hearing it also.

The Dvorak Rhapsody was played here for the first time, as far as I am informed, and is either labored in its composition or else was played in a heavy, inflexible manner; I think the former was the principal difficulty, for although the scoring in the main is masterly, and there are many happy effects, still it failed to be satisfactory in its effort, and did not please the audience. Dvorak often misses the mark as regards a definite purpose in his compositions.

In the playing of the Schubert Symphony there was somewhat of disappointment, when the results obtained at the first concert are remembered. There was overmuch rasping of the strings, and the brass was overloud and harsh a large part of the time. As for the wood-wind, which was used with so much discretion at the previous concert, on this occasion it was too loud and served often in destroying the delightful effect of the strings, when at times the latter played with delicacy. Take the Andante con moto, for instance. Not once did the wood-wind produce a pianissimo, or hardly a piano, either. Most of the numerous passages which should have been pianissimos were given mezzo-forte, not a bit softer, hence much of the delicacy and sentiment of the movement was lost, and the ending of the movement, which should melt away to a mere breath, was ruined in effect because of the indiscreet efforts of the wind instruments. Many places could be enumerated, did space allow, where the wood-wind spoiled the effect with its overloud playing. What use for the strings to delicately touch a passage if the wind instruments, which should be equally subdued, blow in a loud manner. Unless Mr. Paur restrains his brass more and obliges the wood-wind to discriminate in dynamics and be more refined in quality of tone, the orchestra will soon sink to that state of coarseness in its efforts that has characterized its playing for the past four seasons. There were finely obtained effects during the playing of the symphony and some exaggerated contrasts, but on the whole the work was roughly played, and in saying this the nobility of the work is remembered and the necessity for a full, sonorous and virile tone in many passages is recognized.

Mr. Paur showed earnestness in his work and kept the time rigidly in hand. He also is to be commended for the rapidity with which he took the movements and for the omission of repeats. He began the opening at a moderate pace, and many must have feared that if that was to be the index of his conception, then indeed was a most tedious task before them. When he began the allegro, ma non troppo, however, he took it in so spirited a manner that all doubts were removed and one became at ease again as regards the tempi.

Of Mrs. Nordica's singing, much praise must be given for her rendering of the Massenet aria. She was not so happy, however, in the Beethoven aria, for she seemed to be overweighted with its dramatic demands. She failed to bring out the upward scale in the latter part of the air that makes at its climax such a wonderful effect. Generally speaking, Mrs. Nordica used her lovely voice with discretion. It is to be regretted that she is to take part in some performances of Wagner's trilogy, for there is danger that her delicate and beautiful voice may be injured, if not ruined thereby.

Mr. Paur directed the accompaniments in a commendable manner. It should be recorded also that courtesy and politeness are a part of his manners, for he assisted the singer during her entrances and exits. Can any one remember when any lady artist has been so honored during the past four seasons? The concert was a little long; a shorter symphony would have served better on this occasion. Next Saturday, Goetz's symphony in F major, op. 9, will be given and Mr. Schroeder will play the serenade by Volkmann, for cello. Beethoven's overture, "Leonora," No. 3, will complete the programme.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE SYMPHONY AND OTHER CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

If, as was said here a week ago, the initial concert of the current Symphony series was an exceptionally fine first performance, certainly the concert of last evening will be accepted as following worthily that excellent lead.

It is too soon, of course, to talk about perfection. The understanding between the conductor and his four-score men seems to be of the best; for, when one catches a glimpse of his face, one sees sympathy and approval in the look it wears, while the musicians say that they like his treatment of them and the music and mean to support him. But as yet there must necessarily be something tentative in what he and they do, and this double anxiety of itself militates against entire ease and smoothness. The brass instruments have not yet learned to attack a phrase all together as one voice, the first violins still incline occasionally to take the lead even when it is not their turn, and the tone color is somewhat spotty here and there, while some phrasing is stiff and cautious.

But the conductor's plan seems to be all right—to work not for himself, but for the music and the musicians. He seems intent on giving the author his clearest possible light; preserving for each component of the score its proper place; insuring its own fair chance for every instrument; encouraging and stimulating the players, but depending on them for the personal enthusiasm which will make the life, spirit, warmth and sentiment of the readings come finally from them, as it should. Those of us who sit in front and see only Mr. Paur's back and the movements of his arms, may judge him to be a little dry and formal; but the orchestra themselves speak of him as no less energizing than manly, a conductor who will, they think, move them to do their best and stand behind them strongly, like a good general, while they are doing it. And they hint that a solid fortnight longer will be needed to get the great machine running smoothly and with its proper power and pianey.

The second programme took more time than the first, for it included the tremendously long C-major symphony of Schubert, which would have been better assigned to an evening when the participation of a vocalist did not make five numbers necessary. The other instrumental works were Volkmann's dramatic "Richard the Third" overture, so gloomy and almost gruesome in its moody introduction, so furious and noisy in its battle pictures, and so melancholy in the short conclusion which follows the conflict, and the second Rhapsody of Dvorak. This latter was new to Boston, and on this first hearing seemed to substantiate its title. It is almost a tone-picture, as the phrase goes, being a series of wandering and yet connected episodes derived principally from a pleasant phrase presented, after a couple of clamorous chords, by a few voices from the wooden wind. Rhythm, time and accent change constantly, and no choir long holds the predominance. But for the strong sense of unity which binds these episodes so that each seems to be in its proper place as a consequent and a cause, one might almost set down the work among improvisations. It has more interest than positive character, perhaps, and will be made welcome as an occasional visitor rather than as a constant friend.

The management of these three works has been already implied in our opening paragraph. It was firm, intellectual, earnest, fair-minded and forceful, with no little delicacy and elasticity, giving much pleasure at the time and in recollection and promising well for the future.

Mme. Nordica sang—with orchestral accompaniment—Salome's large sweet air from Massenet's "Herodiade" and Leonora's great scene in Beethoven's "Fidelio." The former had grace and refinement and the latter had honest strength and sincerity. Mme. Nordica is a dramatic, but not a passionate singer, and she wisely refrained from attempting to put intensity into the Beethoven recitative, and depended chiefly for her effect upon the gentleness and quiet firmness of the air. She was in excellent voice and mood, sang generously and freely and was recalled several times. It was pleasant to see that Mr. Paur, unlike Mr. Nikisch, brought some good manners with him, and escorted his soloist from the ante-room to the platform.

Mr. Kneisel was absent from his place and Mr. Loeffler led the first violins.

The next programme stands thus. Goetz's F major symphony; a serenade by Volkmann, Mr. Schroeder playing the cello solo, and Beethoven's overture "Leonora, No. 3."

CYNICISMS.

I wonder what impression the new conductor of the Symphony Orchestra will make. I do not mean what the public and the critics will think of him, but what effect he will have on the more youthful femininity that glorify the rehearsals. It seems that Mr. Paur is a blonde. He is the first who has wielded a baton over the orchestra. The others were of a different complexion. This should be in his favor, as a mere matter of change. However, all will depend on the girls. I wonder if they will forget the allegiance they swore to Mr. Nikisch when he was new to them; how they admired the poetic pallor of his countenance, and were fascinated by the whiteness of his hands when they protruded beyond the extensive shirt cuffs that he affected. I think, too, that they felt drawn toward him by the fact that he appeared to be in ill health, and that the prevailing expression of his face was one of profound melancholy. It is true that they never saw him when he was drinking lager beer or playing poker, but that was only so much in his favor. I cannot say that I admired him very greatly as a conductor, but I had a sincere admiration for him in his aspect as a poseur. There can be no question that he had talent in a certain way, as a musician, but he was gifted with positive genius for posing. I remember when he first came here the members of the orchestra were delighted with him. They hailed him as a welcome change from the stern discipline of his predecessor, Gericke, as they hailed the latter as a vast improvement on his predecessor, Henschel. In Nikisch there was nothing of Henschel's lack of camaraderie, or of Gericke's dignified stiffness. In fact, the men were charmed with him. By and by, however, this feeling of enthusiasm dimmed, and then dissipated. If I were a conductor, I am not sure whether I should feel pleased or otherwise if an orchestra took to me with admiration at the outset of my acquaintance with them. I have known many orchestras, but I never met one that did not heartily dislike its conductor after it had served under him for any length of time. I am curious to learn what the Symphony Orchestra thinks of its new conductor. Its opinion is doubtless favorable, but it is as certain to go the other way as it is that to-morrow's sun will shine. This matters very little, however, for Herr Paur's success here does not depend on his orchestra's like or dislike of him. It depends on the ladies. From all the reports that have preceded him hither, it would appear that he is a man eminently fitted for the post he has been called upon to fill. That, however, is not essentially a prime factor in his possible success. All depends on how he begins; on how and by whom he is taken up. Of course, it is understood that an artist occupying so prominent a position as that of conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, must be taken up; and already there is a spirited competition among the usual takers. This eagerness to obtain him is easily accounted for, on the ground that those who succeed in catching him attain a certain distinction as art patrons, and shine by reflected light. The only difficulty in the matter is, that there are rival coteries, little cliques, so to speak, each one of which is at daggers drawn with the others; and the consequence is that, if he permits himself to be caught by one, he makes enemies of the rest. The situation is perplexing; and it is to be hoped that Herr Paur will learn who is who and what is what before he suffers himself to be captured by the lion hunters, who become lions themselves through the larger lions that they capture. After he is once in the toils, he must be careful to remember that he is tethered, and must not strain his rope and get into the next field, if he would not find himself suddenly in disfavor with his capturers. As for his artistic merits, he may leave them safely to the judgment and appreciation of the really musical public and his critics. Still, I await the verdict of the Rehearsal girls; not on his conducting, but on the impression his personality will make. They have admired all of the Symphony conductors in turn, but they raved over Nikisch, despite the peculiar cut of his trousers, and remained loyal to him when nearly everybody else had deserted him. It remains to be seen if they will transfer their admiration in its gushing fulness to his successor. If he knew the intensity of the feeling experienced by Japonicadom to see him, and to pass judgment on him, he could scarcely avoid a painful nervousness until the ordeal was over. Does he realize how much hinges on that first Friday afternoon?

* * *

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in C major, "Jupiter."
BRAHMS.	DOUBLE CONCERTO for VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO
HAYDN.	SYMPHONY in D major.

Soloists :

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

84

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

H. GOETZ.

SYMPHONY in F major, op. 9.

I. Allegro moderato.

II. Intermezzo: Allegretto.

III. Adagio ma non troppo lento.

IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

VOLKMANN.

SERENADE for STRINGS, No 3, in D minor, op. 69.

Larghetto non troppo.

Violoncello Solo; MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, op. 72

Adagio.—Allegro.

85

The Symphony Concert. Adm.

There was a decided advance all along the line, in the performance of Saturday's programme. Not only was there a clearness and precision to which we have latterly been strangers, but the reserve and pedagogic character which characterized the reading of some of the works of the first two concerts here vanished altogether; some of the movements were given with a dramatic power that was as welcome as it was unexpected. Mr. Paur evidently believes in giving the symphony while the audience is fresh and full of attention, and therefore, as in the first concert, the largest work began the programme.

Goetz has proved to the world that it is not impossible for a genius to starve even in the present generation. His single symphony is much more than an echo of the Schumann works, and it was an interesting novelty in the repertoire of our concerts. When this same symphony was given in Vienna (Feb. 1875) the composer was unable to accept an invitation to attend the performance because of his inability to bear the expense of the railroad fare! While he did not absolutely perish by starvation, his poverty undoubtedly hastened his end, and he died in the "fatal thirties" as did Mozart and Schubert, and indirectly from a similar combat with the wolf at the door. It would be folly to rank the symphony in F with the masterpieces of the two preceding concerts, but it is graceful, symmetrical, the composer does not stagger under the large form, and in every way it formed a good selection for the programme.

It began with commendable warmth and vigor, and the brilliancy of the orchestra in the rather intricate development gave augury of an excellent concert, a promise that was abundantly fulfilled. The second movement is full of effects for the wind instruments. This department of the orchestra had already shown its mettle in the second concert, in the Schubert symphony, and now repeated the good impression. The woodwind is better than it has been in a long time, and the horns are decidedly improving, although they are not yet at the standard which they held when the eccentric Reiter (he of the Gypsy locks and ferocious manner) was first horn. However, in this movement, all of the wind instruments did splendid work. There was not the suspicion of a break on any of the brasses, the clarinettes did perfect work, and the flute obligato (Mr. Molé) was especially brilliant. This movement aroused especial enthusiasm.

The adagio comes in third place in this work, for purposes of contrast, and has a peculiar charm in its horn duet, which was well played, and in its theme for first violins against pizzicati in the deeper strings, which went magnificently. There was a romance in the reading as well as in the orchestral details, and it proved that our new conductor is by no means a one-sided man. The success was continued to the end of the work, and the breadth of the finale was striking. The serenade for Strings (Volkmann, D minor) was, of course, well played, for this part of our orchestra is as fine a body of musicians as can be found anywhere, and Mr. Alwyn Schroeder was the soloist, and won great applause in his work; but the work is too long for what it has to say. It begins with a most characteristic theme, elegiac in character, suggestive of Ossianic plaints or mournful Jeremiads. There are some vivid contrasts made by the introduction of bold folk-themes, which were taken by the orchestra with fine ensemble, but as a whole the work presents an intentional monotony of sorrow which at last becomes irritating as a Mrs. Gummidge, being almost as constantly in tears as that lachrymose female.

The best came last. Beethoven's Leonora overture No. 3 is the most dramatic work of its kind. It lost nothing in the reading or in the performance. If it was theatrical it had the full right to be so. The wild rush of strings picturing the fierce Pizarro springing upon the helpless Florestan, the prompt entrance of the distant trumpet call, the glorious contrast of the theme of thanksgiving following this signal of deliverance, the shading of the second, louder, call, showing that the governor is at the very portals, the flute passages of the finale, the syncopations of the coda (especially clear were these) and the almost deliriously brilliant violin passages of the end, these were some of the points of the performance. There was an occasional freedom in tempo, but no distortion, and, with due gratitude be it spoken, nothing that savored of bombast. If this standard can be maintained we may feel absolutely serene when Daniel goes into the lions' den, and our leader is heard in New York.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT. Review.

The new conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra gave the season's patrons a delightful concert last evening, and it was quite evident that the feeling of satisfaction with regard to the attainments of Mr. Paur was strengthened by his work at this occasion.

A highly pleasing performance of the Goetz symphony in F major, Op. 9 came first on the programme, and it was played with a degree of refinement, grace and expression that commanded the heartiest approval. The dainty intermezzo was given with faultless taste, and its rare beauties were delightfully interpreted.

The Volkmann serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, Op. 69, followed, with Mr. Alwyn Schroeder as the solo cellist. This composition displayed the string band to the best advantage, and Mr. Schroeder surpassed even his own most admirable work in the solo passages. The audience was quick to recognize the merits of both the soloist and the performance of the serenade, and Mr. Paur most courteously shared the applause with Mr. Schroeder.

A splendid performance of the "Leonore," No. 3, overture, ended the programme. Mme. Eames is the soloist next Saturday evening and the symphony will be that by Strauss, in F minor.

TAVERN.

It was a very jolly party that entertained Mr. Paur, the new leader of the symphony orchestra, after the concert Saturday night. Mr. Paur expressed himself as greatly pleased and even flattered at the attention shown him. Those around the board were T. Adamowski, I. M. Gaugengigl, Arthur Foote, Curtis Guild, Jr., Arlo Bates, Isidore Braggiotti and F. P. Vinton.

At the next meeting of the club Mr. Paur will be elected an honorary member.

Third of the Season's Symphony Offerings — Suffolk Musicals — Other Harmonic Happenings.

The third symphony concert given under Mr Paur's direction has strengthened the favorable impression he had already made upon his audiences, and gives assurance that all the promises made in behalf of the Leipzig conductor will be fulfilled. Mr Paur seems now to feel thoroughly at home in his new position, and an excellent understanding seems to be established between leader and orchestra.

Neither of Mr Paur's predecessors so readily gained the good will and esteem of the members of this orchestra. Every member now appears to be devoted to him and to endeavor to faithfully follow his instructions and to do all that is possible to contribute to the success of a performance.

Such evidence of good will is certainly most welcome and should result in Mr Paur being able to raise the orchestra's already very high standard of excellence.

The audiences are also becoming more appreciative of the new director's abilities. The applause at both Friday's rehearsal and last night's concert was much more cordial and general than before.

Although yesterday's program contained little variety and offered slight opportunity for contrast of orchestral effects, the offerings were very enjoyable. The numbers were H. Goetz' symphony in F major, Volkmann's serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, and Beethoven's No. 3 overture to "Leonora."

The Goetz symphony is a scholarly composition, and considerable originality is shown in the treatment of themes, which are in themselves rather commonplace. The scoring is elaborate, and offers excellent opportunity for displaying the resources and discipline of an orchestra, but it is not a work calculated to win especial favor from an average symphony concert audience.

The second is the most popular of the four movements, and last evening received rather the best interpretation. Especially pleasing was the work of the horns and clarinets, especially pleasing because these instruments have been known to offend in the past. The other movements were played with very good effect, barring, possibly, a slight suggestion of heaviness in interpreting the elaborately ornamented figures of the rhapsody.

The most enjoyable feature of the program was the thoroughly excellent performance of Volkmann's serenade. A more satisfactory performance of this charming composition has probably never been given by the orchestra, a strong statement to make considering the almost invariable excellence of the work by the string players of this organization.

Much of the enjoyment derived from the interpretation was due to the splendid playing of the solo cello by Mr Alvin Schroeder. His tones were deliciously clear and mellow, giving exquisite effect to the tender, almost mournful melodies of this rarely beautiful work.

There was good reason for the enthusiasm of the audience and the three recalls given director and soloist.

Beethoven's lovely "Leonora" overture received from Mr Paur a faithful and sympathetic interpretation. There was much delicacy of expression in the treatment of the sentimental passages, and the magnificent coda was worked up to with splendid effect.

Mme Emma Eames will be the soloist at the next concert, for which the following program has been arranged: symphony in F minor, Strauss (first time); aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; aria from "Armide," Gluck; overture, "Academic Festival," Brahms.

PLANS FOR THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Architects Have Been Working at Them for Some Time, but They Are Not Sufficiently Settled to be Announced Yet. Trans. Sept. 27, 1913

The plans for the new Music Hall are all in the air as yet. All that is known is that it will be as large as the present, if that is practicable. It will not be any larger, for the present hall is considered as large a one as could possibly be built and furnish either good acoustic properties or good seats throughout its whole extent. The plans have been in the hands of architects for some time, who have been simply working on various ideas, and trying to evolve the best experimental plan they can to submit to the stockholders. When the $200,000 has been all paid in and the corporation organized the plans will be submitted to them, and until then nothing can be determined as to the architecture or arrangement of the building. There will in any event be only one grand hall. No smaller halls will be provided in the building for any purpose. In order to reproduce Bumstead Hall in the new structure it would be necessary to elevate the main hall some thirty feet above the ground, thereby enormously increasing the expense of construction and reducing the possibility of safe egress in case of fire. The loss of Bumstead Hall will be severely felt.

One thing to be understood is that there has got to be a new Music Hall, whether the rapid-transit bill is passed or not, and its almost assured defeat will make no difference to the projectors of the new hall except as giving them a little more time. The present Music Hall is on an immensely valuable plot of land, that is worth more for other purposes, besides being bad of access. The hall needs repairs badly, and to make it last for its present use much longer a large sum of money would have to be spent on it, a thing nobody would be likely to do. It has been clear to Colonel Higginson and his friends for some time that Boston must have a new Music Hall within a few years, and the rapid-transit-bill scare has only hastened it.

The meeting of stockholders to organize and consider plans will be held about Dec. 1. The work of preparing the plans is in the hands of McKim, Mead & White, who have already put a great deal of work into the design, but nothing is sufficiently settled as to the style of the building to be announced yet.

The third Symphony Concert was an agreeably short performance of only three numbers. It was a solo programme, too, its central selection being a sweet and graceful serenade for violoncello, written by Volkmann, and displaying more his melodious and sensuous moods than those strong and stormy phases of temperament which his distinctly orchestral work is wont to show. The player was Mr. Alvin Schroeder, whom to name is to praise, since a performance by him is sure to exhibit a sure but unostentatious mastery of the technique of his instrument, a nice appreciation of the structure of whatsoever composition he chooses and much warmth of sympathy with its interior character. He is never a vehement player, in respect either to tone or emphasis, but his art is true and fine, which is better than power rudely or carelessly manifested. Strictly speaking, the construction of this serenade is such that the cello part might be considered in the light of an obligato, rather than as a formal solo. Being written entirely for the string band, and the responses between the violins and the cello being frequent, the effect is necessarily different from that of a regular concerto. But the form and treatment suit well with the idea and the result is no less poetic than pleasing.

The symphony which began the evening was that by Goetze, in F, which was heard under Mr. Nikisch's direction in November, 1889. It is not a great composition, if you will, because its thoughts are simple its development unforced and its sentiment natural. It makes no attempt to overwhelm with power, to astonish by strangeness or puzzle by mystery. It used the full standard orchestra and is therewith well content. It shows melodic invention, contrapuntal skill (particularly in the second and last movements), and has so much alternate gaiety and placidity of temper as to make it a general favorite.

The overture, placed at the end of the programme, was Beethoven's "Leonore, No. 3," which surely needs only a mention to have its magnificently dramatic character recalled to any Boston concert goer.

The performance of this programme gave ample assurance that Mr. Paur is to be something more than a formalist or will care for something more than precision. There was no lack of variety in his treatment and the mass of the orchestra was swayed more easily and pliantly than on either of the previous evenings. It must be borne in mind that there was great need of exactitude and obedience to the very inception of the conductor's beat, and that, until these were obtained, it was too soon to attempt the delicacies of phrasing or the refinements of expression. But from the finished fineness of the allegretto in the symphony to the tremendous vigor of the finale in the overture, was a far cry, and that, admirably distinguished as these were, there was no less justice in the fanciful wanderings of the serenade, the smooth sweetness of the adagio of the symphony and the great speed and energy of its last movement. Many minor details of which we cannot now pause to speak, were equally well distinguished in intention and execution, and that the attentive audience felt the growing warmth and breadth of the conducting was made plain by the readiness and earnestness of the applause, which called Mr. Paur forward again and again after the symphony and the serenade. The latter tribute was gracefully shared with Mr. Schroeder, who had deserved well indeed.

Next week's programme will have one novelty—Richard Strauss's F minor symphony. Saint-Saens' "Rouet d'Omphale" and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture will also be played, and Mrs. Emma Eames Story will sing from Massenet's "Cid" and Gheek's "Armide."

Comer

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third concert of the Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

F major Symphony, op. 9.....Goetz
Serenade for string orchestra No. 3, D minor.....Volkmann
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven

Hermann Goetz had the good fortune to die young. He is now called "a composer of great promise," and some would even enroll him among the immortals. He escaped the possibility of disappointing hope.

Goetz is best known abroad as the maker of an opera, "The Taming of the Shrew." For a comedy he wrote music that might fit a tragedy. Perhaps he took life too seriously; at any rate his musical surety suffers from introspection, and Petruchio is a metaphysician. In the opera there is little lightness, there is little grace; but whenever coquetry approaches passion, the music is more suitable.

There is a motto to this symphony, and it runs as follows: "Into the quiet, holy regions of the heart must thou fly from the stress of life." But what have these lines to do with the music? Goetz might as well have chosen for a motto:

"Eternal silence laughs along the shore,
And spectral negroes bleach upon the floor."

This is absolute music, not programme music, not motto music. What has the pretty, graceful second movement to do with "the holy regions of the heart" or "the stress of life?" Nothing, absolutely nothing. The music is pretty, and that is all.

Ehrhart once said that the adagio died with Beethoven, an epigrammatic saying, and untrue. For if in certain adagios by Beethoven there is an unearthly beauty, a vision of another world; if there are things never heard by mortals except by Beethoven, there are, nevertheless, adagios of Schumann and Brahms that reach sublime heights. There are beautiful passages in the adagios of Goetz; but there is too much music, and at times the hearer thinks of the learned German who wrote a treatise in 10 volumes and then wrote a supplement in 15 volumes to explain his original theories and conclusions.

The great trouble with the symphony by Goetz is that it is without individuality. It has no cachet. When you hear unfamiliar music, say, by Gounod, to take an example in modern times, you know that the music is by Gounod, even if there is no name attached, even if the music is weak. It is not the music of Saint-Saens, it is not the music of Berlioz. It is that of Gounod. Now in this symphony by Goetz, the last movement is Schumann strained through a sieve.

In the serenade by Volkmann the solo cello sits apart, like a mourner in the wilderness or like the usher in mood's poem, "A melancholy man." Nor does he discontinue his complaint, even when he hears the sounds of merriment, or when he is invited to join in the dance. The serenade is a singular composition, not without genuine beauty—an agreeable contrast to much of Volkmann's music that might have been written by a sleek, prosperous, excellent professor; that does not reveal the unhappiness of a disappointed, suffering man.

The playing of the orchestra was in the main admirable. Mr. Schroeder delivered the solo passages in the serenade in a sympathetic manner. The reading of the overture was dramatic, almost feverish. There were many fine points in it, as, for instance, the mad rush before the first trumpet call. On the other hand, there were moments when the rhythm that should be like a mighty pulse flazged, because there was over-elaboration in a detail.

PHILIP HALE.

Third of the Season's Symphony Offerings — Suffolk Musicals — Other Harmonic Happenings.

The third symphony concert given under Mr Paur's direction has strengthened the favorable impression he had already made upon his audiences, and gives assurance that all the promises made in behalf of the Leipsic conductor will be fulfilled. Mr Paur seem now to feel thoroughly at home in his new position, and an excellent understanding seems to be established between leader and orchestra.

Neither of Mr Paur's predecessors so readily gained the good will and esteem of the members of this orchestra. Every member now appears to be devoted to him and to endeavor to faithfully follow his instructions and to do all that is possible to contribute to the success of a performance.

Such evidence of good will is certainly most welcome and should result in Mr Paur being able to raise the orchestra's already very high standard of excellence.

The audiences are also becoming more appreciative of the new director's abilities. The applause at both Friday's rehearsal and last night's concert was much more cordial and general than before.

Although yesterday's program contained little variety and offered slight opportunity for contrast of orchestral effects, the offerings were very enjoyable. The numbers were H. Goetz' symphony in F major, Volkmann's serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, and Beethoven's No. 3 overture to "Leonora."

The Goetz symphony is a scholarly composition, and considerable originality is shown in the treatment of themes, which are in themselves rather commonplace. The scoring is elaborate, and offers excellent opportunity for displaying the resources and discipline of an orchestra, but it is not a work calculated to win especial favor from an average symphony concert audience.

The second is the most popular of the four movements, and last evening received rather the best interpretation. Especially pleasing was the work of the horns and clarinets, especially pleasing because these instruments have been known to offend in the past. The other movements were played with very good effect, barring, possibly, a slight suggestion of heaviness in interpreting the elaborately ornamented figures of the rondo.

The most enjoyable feature of the program was the thoroughly excellent performance of Volkmann's serenade. A more satisfactory performance of this charming composition has probably never been given by the orchestra, a strong statement to make considering the almost invariable excellence of the work by the string players of this organization.

Much of the enjoyment derived from the interpretation was due to the splendid playing of the solo cello by Mr Alvin Schroeder. His tones were deliciously clear and mellow, giving exquisite effect to the tender, almost mournful melodies of this rarely beautiful work.

There was good reason for the enthusiasm of the audience and the three recalls given director and soloist.

Beethoven's lovely "Leonora" overture received from Mr Paur a faithful and sympathetic interpretation. There was much delicacy of expression in the treatment of the sentimental passages, and the magnificent coda was worked up to with splendid effect.

Mme Emma Eames will be the soloist at the next concert, for which the following program has been arranged: Symphony in F minor, Strauss (first time); aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; aria from "Armide," Gluck; overture, "Academic Festival," Brahms.

PLANS FOR THE NEW MUSIC HALL.

Architects Have Been Working at Them for Some Time, but They Are Not Sufficiently Settled to be Announced Yet. Trans. from N.Y. Times, Sept. 27, 1913

The plans for the new Music Hall are all in the air as yet. All that is known is that it will be as large as the present, if that is practicable. It will not be any larger, for the present hall is considered as large a one as could possibly be built and furnish either good acoustic properties or good seats throughout its whole extent. The plans have been in the hands of architects for some time, who have been simply working on various ideas, and trying to evolve the best experimental plan they can to submit to the stockholders. When the $200,000 has been all paid in and the corporation organized the plans will be submitted to them, and until then nothing can be determined as to the architecture or arrangement of the building. There will in any event be only one grand hall. No smaller halls will be provided in the building for any purpose. In order to reproduce Bumstead Hall in the new structure it would be necessary to elevate the main hall some thirty feet above the ground, thereby enormously increasing the expense of construction and reducing the possibility of safe egress in case of fire. The loss of Bumstead Hall will be severely felt.

One thing to be understood is that there has got to be a new Music Hall, whether the rapid-transit bill is passed or not, and its almost assured defeat will make no difference to the projectors of the new hall except as giving them a little more time. The present Music Hall is on an immensely valuable plot of land, that is worth more for other purposes, besides being bad of access. The hall needs repairs badly, and to make it last for its present use much longer a large sum of money would have to be spent on it, a thing nobody would be likely to do. It has been clear to Colonel Higginson and his friends for some time that Boston must have a new Music Hall within a few years, and the rapid-transit-bill scare has only hastened it.

The meeting of stockholders to organize and consider plans will be held about Dec. 1. The work of preparing the plans is in the hands of McKim, Mead & White, who have already put a great deal of work into the design, but nothing is sufficiently settled as to the style of the building to be announced yet.

The third Symphony Concert was an agreeably short performance of only three numbers. It was a solo programme, too, its central selection being a sweet and graceful serenade for violoncello, written by Volkmann, and displaying more his melodious and sensuous moods than those strong and stormy phases of temperament which his distinctly orchestral work is wont to show. The player was Mr. Alvin Schroeder, whom to name is to praise, since a performance by him is sure to exhibit a sure but unostentatious mastery of the technique of his instrument, a nice appreciation of the structure of whatsoever composition he chooses and much warmth of sympathy with its interior character. He is never a vehement player, in respect either to tone or emphasis, but his art is true and fine, which is better than power rudely or carelessly manifested. Strictly speaking, the construction of this serenade is such that the 'cello part might be considered in the light of an obligato, rather than as a formal solo. Being written entirely for the string band, and the responses between the violins and the 'cello being frequent, the effect is necessarily different from that of a regular concerto. But the form and treatment suit well with the idea and the result is no less poetic than pleasing.

The symphony which began the evening was that by Goetz, in F, which was heard under Mr. Nikisch's direction in November, 1889. It is not a great composition, if you will, because its thoughts are simple its development unforced and its sentiment natural. It makes no attempt to overwhelm with power, to astonish by strangeness or puzzle by mystery. It used the full standard orchestra and is therewith well content. It shows melodic invention, contrapuntal skill (particularly in the second and last movements), and has so much alternate gaiety and placidity of temper as to make it a general favorite.

The overture, placed at the end of the programme, was Beethoven's "Leonore, No. 3," which surely needs only a mention to have its magnificently dramatic character recalled to any Boston concert goer.

The performance of this programme gave ample assurance that Mr. Paur is to be something more than a formalist or will care for something more than precision. There was no lack of variety in his treatment and the mass of the orchestra was swayed more easily and pliantly than on either of the previous evenings. It must be borne in mind that there was great need of exactitude and obedience to the very inception of the conductor's beat, and that, until these were obtained, it was too soon to attempt the delicacies of phrasing or the refinements of expression. But from the finished fineness of the allegretto in the symphony to the tremendous vigor of the finale in the overture, was a far cry, and that, admirably distinguished as these were, there was no less justice in the fanciful wanderings of the serenade, the smooth sweetness of the adagio of the symphony and the great speed and energy of its last movement. Many minor details of which we cannot now pause to speak, were equally well distinguished in intention and execution, and that the attentive audience felt the growing warmth and breadth of the conducting was made plain by the readiness and earnestness of the applause, which called Mr. Paur forward again and again after the symphony and the serenade. The latter tribute was gracefully shared with Mr. Schroeder, who had deserved well indeed.

Next weeks programme will have one novelty—Richard Strauss's F minor symphony. Saint-Saen's "Rouet d' Omphale" and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture will also be played, and Mrs. Emma Eames Story will sing from Massenet's "Cid" and Gheek's "Armide."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

The Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third concert of the Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

F major Symphony, op. 9.....Goetz
Serenade for string orchestra No. 3, D minor.....Volkmann
Overture, "Leonore" No. 3.....Beethoven

Hermann Goetz had the good fortune to die young. He is now called "a composer of great promise," and some would even enroll him among the immortals. He escaped the possibility of disappointing hope.

Goetz is best known abroad as the maker of an opera, "The Taming of the Shrew." For a comedy he wrote music that might fit a tragedy. Perhaps he took life too seriously; at any rate his musical shrew suffers from introspection, and Petruchio is a metaphysician. In the opera there is little lightness, there is little grace; but whenever coquetry approaches passion, the music is more suitable.

There is a motto to this symphony, and it runs as follows: "Into the quiet, holy regions of the heart must thou fly from the stress of life." But what have these lines to do with the music? Goetz might as well have chosen for a motto:

"Eternal silence laughs along the shore,
And spectral negroes bleach upon the floor."

This is absolute music, not programme music, not motto music. What has the pretty, graceful second movement to do with "the holy regions of the heart" or "the stress of life?" Nothing, absolutely nothing. This music is pretty, and that is all.

Ehrlert once said that the adagio died with Beethoven, an epigrammatic saying, and untrue. For if in certain adagios by Beethoven there is an unearthly beauty, a vision of another world; if there are things never heard by mortals except by Beethoven, there are, nevertheless, adagios of Schumann and Brahms that reach sublime heights. There are beautiful passages in the adagios of Goetz; but there is too much music, and at times the hearer thinks of the learned German who wrote a treatise in 10 volumes and then wrote a supplement in 15 volumes to explain his original theories and conclusions.

The great trouble with the symphony by Goetz is that it is without individuality. It has no cachet. When you hear unfamiliar music, say, by Gounod, to take an example in modern times, you know that the music is by Gounod, even if there is no name attached, even if the music is weak. It is not the music of Saint Saens, it is not the music of Berlioz. It is that of Gounod. Now in this symphony by Goetz, the last movement is Schumann strained through a sieve.

In the serenade by Volkmann the solo 'cello sits apart, like a mourner in the wilderness or like the usher in mood's poem, "A melancholy man." Nor does he discontinue his complaint, even when he hears the sounds of merriment, or when he is invited to join in the dance. The serenade is a singular composition, not without genuine beauty—an agreeable contrast to much of Volkmann's music that might have been written by a sleek, prosperous, excellent professor; that does not reveal the unhappiness of a disappointed, suffering man.

The playing of the orchestra was in the main admirable. Mr. Schroeder delivered the solo passages in the serenade in a sympathetic manner. The reading of the overture was dramatic, almost feverish. There were many fine points in it, as, for instance, the mad rush before the first trumpet call. On the other hand, there were moments when the rhythm that should be like a mighty pulse flagged, because there was over-elaboration in a detail.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The selections were: Symphony in F, op. 9, Goetz; Serenade, Volkmann, of which the 'cello solo was played by Mr. A. Schroeder, and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3. It was not a very brilliant programme, nor a specially interesting one. The performances of last night would seem to indicate that Mr. Paur and his orchestra are now in perfect sympathy with each other. On this occasion, as on the others of the season, thus far, the extreme solicitude of the conductor for the most minute attention to details in his readings of the works presented, was again conspicuous. It is, however, open to question if something of spontaneity in effect and something of smoothness in flow is not lost by this excessive elaboration, especially in such a composition as the Beethoven overture, which, under super-conscientious care to emphasize every possible point, takes on a somewhat fragmentary aspect, and becomes a collection of detached effects, rather than a closely-knitted and self-consistent whole. Under the treatment to which it was subjected, especially in the changes made in the time, the phrases seemed to be too widely separated, and the connection of one with the other was often severed; and, if we may use the word, the "oneness" of the work was dissipated. Except for this, the interpretation was one of the most brilliant and stirring the work has ever had at these concerts;—intensely theatrical, it is true; but why not? The overture was written for the theatre. We cannot recall as effective a preparation for the trumpet fanfare behind the scene, as that which Mr. Paur made. The climax of the overture was worked up with splendid fire. The playing of the orchestra was magnificent. It has not been heard to such advantage before, in three years. Everything was so clear, so decisive: there was such unity and precision in the overwhelming rush of string tone, and such broad nobility in effect. The symphony was finely read and played, but we must confess that we find all its worth and all its beauties in the first allegro, and the intermezzo. The latter movement was exquisitely colored. The cello solo in the serenade was gracefully and tastefully played by Mr. Schroeder. The sincerity and the earnestness of Mr. Paur make themselves more and more felt, and with his thoroughly artistic absorption in his work to the avoidance of all posing for effect, intensify the respect that he won for himself at the very outset. The instrumental selections for the next concert are: Symphony in F minor, Strauss (first time); "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; "Academy" Overture, Brahms. Mme. Emma Eames is to be the soloist, and sing an air by Massenet, and one by Gluck.

90
OCTOBER 30, 1893

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goetz: Symphony in F major, Opus 9.
Volkmann: Serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, Opus 36. (Cello solo: Mr. Alwin Schroeder.)
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Opus 72.

The Goetz symphony is an old friend whom one is glad to meet again, especially as such meetings do not come about often. It is a work of highly cultured talent rather than of genius; yet the line separating it from mere Kapellmeister-Musik is sufficiently distinctly drawn. The composer's inspiration flows in a rather tenuous stream, but it is recognizably genuine inspiration, for all that. Goetz was too young, in experience as a composer, if not actually in years, when he wrote it, to impress upon it the stamp of a sharply outlined individuality; he was still in what would have been recognized as his "first period," had he been spared to live and grow in strength and mastery. But it is excellently well written and genial music, albeit one feels that it is not destined to outlive the ages. Except the Intermezzo, there is little in the work that one would care to go to any trouble to preserve; it is all good, but not good enough to take up the room of better things. The Intermezzo, however, is a gem, a bit of real inspiration and not a little originality. Some of us can remember the unbounded enthusiasm it created here when the symphony was first given, some twenty and odd years ago, in the old Harvard Musical days; the more hot-headed were even ready to rank it with the scherzo in Gade's B-flat symphony, or the one in his symphony in C minor. And it is saying not a little for it that it still retains its charm. The performance given the work by Mr. Paur and the orchestra was in every respect admirable; it was highly finished well-shaded, thoroughly artistic playing, giving the clearest idea of just what the music is. Particularly fine was the way in which Goetz's instrumentation was allowed to retain its true flavor, regardless of consequences. The symphony is scored with classic moderation and a delicacy that reminds one somewhat of Gade, Sterndale Bennett, and others of the Leipzig school; it is a sort of orchestration which, for good or evil, is now a thing of the past, and is, moreover, by no means adapted to produce any very striking effect in places like our Music Hall—especially nowadays that our ears have grown accustomed to more boldly sonorous scoring. But Mr. Paur was content to take the symphony as the symphony was meant and let the effect take care of itself; if the hall was too big, that was the fault of the hall and none of his business; he did not try to "modernize" the instrumentation by over-strenuous playing to make it vie in effect with any modern thunderings.

The Volkmann serenade brings to our mind the question once more: Why try to dig up the poor old composer from his grave and make him revisit thus the glimpses of the moon—not in complete steel, but as a very diaphanous ghost, the stars dim-twinkling through him? He was a hard and sincere worker during a tolerably long life, and an unkind and too careless world rewarded him with starvation; but, now that he is past apologizing to, what is the need of trying to give him a semblance of posthumous popularity? It does him no good and it bores the rest of the world mightily. Il n'y a que les morts qui ne reviennent pas,—would that this were true! for Volkmann is dead, dead as a door-nail, and not all the king's horses nor all the king's men can galvanize him into life again. Mr. Schroeder played the 'cello solo very beautifully, indeed the playing of all the strings calls for nothing but commendation.

To Mr. Paur's reading of the great "Leonore" overture we would only apply the pudding test. No doubt his conception of the work is amply defensible—on paper or viva voce; but, to the ear, it does not defend itself. It was thoroughly ineffective and, what was still worse, ineffective at the expense of great seeming effort. The trouble was not only that Mr. Paur's frequent changes of speed broke up the composition into small sections, thus destroying all continuity of impression, but that each change, in itself, seemed too purely voluntary, made with a set and conscious purpose, instead of impressing one as the immediate, uncontrollable expression of a momentary emotion. This constant shifting of the tempo seems to work more ruin in Beethoven than in almost any other composer in the whole list; these sudden fits of piu mosso and meno mosso affect one much like Laputan flappers, intended to act as a fillip to the languishing attention of an audience. The born and bred Laputan, immersed in his own lofty musings, needed the application of the flapper, to remind him that conversation was going forward to which it were well for him to attend; but to us, already interested and absorbed in the conversation, as we are, the flapper is a mere unwelcome interruption, calling our attention to nothing but itself. These effects make a mosaic out of a work that in itself is no mosaic at all, but rather a constant organic development, a growing of something stronger and more vital out of something already strong and vital that precedes it; it is this continuous growth that, as much as anything else, gives the work its enormous dramatic interest and impressiveness. Break it up into disjointed sections, and the music loses all its momentum; every section has to make a fresh start for itself, at an incalculable loss of energy. The advocates of this over-elaborate and mis-called "expressive" style of interpreting Beethoven are fond of speaking of the opposite, to our mind more natural, method as "barrel-organ grinding!" To this we would only oppose the suggestion that "interpreting" Beethoven is at least as apposite a term for what they like so much; for, in listening to a discourse through the medium of an interpreter, one may get an understanding of its meaning, but the process is so laborious that the native flavor, aroma and fire of it are all but inevitably lost.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY.

A Charming Programme Ably Rendered.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was given:

Symphony in F major, op. 9.....H. Goetz
Serenade for strings in D minor, op. 39

Volkmann
(Cello solo by Mr. Alwin Schroeder.)
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

The Goetz Symphony was first performed in this country by the Philharmonic Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Jan. 8, 1880. Later in the same month the Harvard Orchestra played it in Boston. It has also been played by Gerloke in March, 1887, and Nikisch in November, 1888. This symphony shows the hand of the scholarly composer, for its polyphony is admirable. It is replete with beautiful melodies and is scored in the modern vein. The Intermezzo is the most pleasing and the most original movement of the work. It was delightfully played by the orchestra.

The Adagio comes next in interest and originality, but it is rather prolonged in the working out. The lively poetic theme at the beginning of this movement was too loudly given out by the strings, and its delicacy and sentiment were thus marred. There is contrast in plenty in this movement, but it requires a more delicate touch and a more exacting gradation of dynamics to display its full values in shading than our new conductor has shown thus far in his interpretations. The first movement and the last movement are specimens of the fine musicianship of the composer, and though not particularly melodious at length, are spirited and brilliant in their development. In the last movement one is reminded forcibly of Schumann.

This symphony is of sufficient calibre to cause one to regret that its composer should have died so early in life, which event took place in 1876, in his 36th year, from overwork caused by poverty.

The Volkmann Serenade, which has been heard in Boston several times since its first production by the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1879 is a delightful composition, full of romance, and graceful in its setting for the instruments. The solo was delightfully played by Mr. Schroeder, and the orchestra in its efforts displayed the remarkable delicacy and precision for which it is so justly famous. The audience was enraptured with the performance.

Mr. Paur scored a great success in his conception of the Beethoven overture, and in the magnificent rendering, the result of his masterly conducting of the orchestra in the delineation of his conception was apparent. It was dramatic in the extreme and showed that he is possessed of a musical temperament that must in the course of his career here display some rare qualities and stamp him as a musician of deep emotions. Rarely, if ever, has this noble overture been so wonderfully interpreted in our concert halls. The audience recognized this fact with

The Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last night. The selections were: Symphony in F, op. 9, Goetz; Serenade, Volkmann, of which the 'cello solo was played by Mr. A. Schroeder, and Beethoven's "Leonora" overture, No. 3. It was not a very brilliant programme, nor a specially interesting one. The performances of last night would seem to indicate that Mr. Paur and his orchestra are now in perfect sympathy with each other. On this occasion, as on the others of the season, thus far, the extreme solicitude of the conductor for the most minute attention to details in his readings of the works presented, was again conspicuous. It is, however, open to question if something of spontaneity in effect and something of smoothness in flow is not lost by this excessive elaboration, especially in such a composition as the Beethoven overture, which, under super-conscientious care to emphasize every possible point, takes on a somewhat fragmentary aspect, and becomes a collection of detached effects, rather than a closely-knitted and self-consistent whole. Under the treatment to which it was subjected, especially in the changes made in the time, the phrases seemed to be too widely separated, and the connection of one with the other was often severed; and, if we may use the word, the "oneness" of the work was dissipated. Except for this, the interpretation was one of the most brilliant and stirring the work has ever had at these concerts;—intensely theatrical, it is true; but why not? The overture was written for the theatre. We cannot recall as effective a preparation for the trumpet fanfare behind the scene, as that which Mr. Paur made. The climax of the overture was worked up with splendid fire. The playing of the orchestra was magnificent. It has not been heard to such advantage before, in three years. Everything was so clear, so decisive: there was such unity and precision in the overwhelming rush of string tone, and such broad nobility in effect. The symphony was finely read and played, but we must confess that we find all its worth and all its beauties in the first allegro, and the intermezzo. The latter movement was exquisitely colored. The cello solo in the serenade was gracefully and tastefully played by Mr. Schroeder. The sincerity and the earnestness of Mr. Paur make themselves more and more felt, and with his thoroughly artistic absorption in his work to the avoidance of all posing for effect, intensify the respect that he won for himself at the very outset. The instrumental selections for the next concert are: Symphony in F-minor, Strauss (first time); "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; "Academy" Overture, Brahms. Mme. Emma Eames is to be the soloist, and sing an air by Massenet, and one by Gluck.

7, OCTOBER 30, 1893

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goetz: Symphony in F major, Opus 9.
Volkmann: Serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, Opus 36. (Cello solo: Mr. Alwin Schroeder.)
Beethoven: Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, in C major, Opus 72.

The Goetz symphony is an old friend whom one is glad to meet again, especially as such meetings do not come about often. It is a work of highly cultured talent rather than of genius; yet the line separating it from mere Kapellmeister-Musik is sufficiently distinctly drawn. The composer's inspiration flows in a rather tenuous stream, but it is recognizably genuine inspiration, for all that. Goetz was too young, in experience as a composer, if not actually in years, when he wrote it, to impress upon it the stamp of a sharply outlined individuality; he was still in what would have been recognized as his "first period," had he been spared to live and grow in strength and mastery. But it is excellently well written and genial music, albeit one feels that it is not destined to outlive the ages. Except the Intermezzo, there is little in the work that one would care to go to any trouble to preserve; it is all good, but not good enough to take up the room of better things. The Intermezzo, however, is a gem, a bit of real inspiration and not a little originality. Some of us can remember the unbounded enthusiasm it created here when the symphony was first given, some twenty and odd years ago, in the old Harvard Musical days; the more hot-headed were even ready to rank it with the scherzo in Gade's B-flat symphony, or the one in his symphony in C minor. And it is saying not a little for it that it still retains its charm. The performance given the work by Mr. Paur and the orchestra was in every respect admirable; it was highly finished well-shaded, thoroughly artistic playing, giving the clearest idea of just what the music is. Particularly fine was the way in which Goetz's instrumentation was allowed to retain its true flavor, regardless of consequences. The symphony is scored with classic moderation and a delicacy that reminds one somewhat of Gade, Sterndale Bennett, and others of the Leipzig school; it is a sort of orchestration which, for good or evil, is now a thing of the past, and is, moreover, by no means adapted to produce any very striking effect in places like our Music Hall—especially nowadays that our ears have grown accustomed to more boldly sonorous scoring. But Mr. Paur was content to take the symphony as the symphony was meant and let the effect take care of itself; if the hall was too big, that was the fault of the hall and none of his business; he did not try to "modernize" the instrumentation by over-strenuous playing to make it vie in effect with any modern thunderings.

The Volkmann serenade brings to our mind the question once more: Why try to dig up the poor old composer from his grave and make him revisit thus the glimpses of the moon—not in complete steel, but as a very diaphanous ghost, the stars dim-twinkling through him? He was a hard and sincere worker during a tolerably long life, and an unkind and too careless world rewarded him with starvation; but, now that he is past apologizing to, what is the need of trying to give him a semblance of posthumous popularity? It does him no good and it bores the rest of the world mightily. Il n'y a que les morts qui ne reviennent pas,—would that this were true! For Volkmann is dead, dead as a door-nail, and not all the king's horses nor all the king's men can galvanize him into life again. Mr. Schroeder played the cello solo very beautifully, indeed the playing of all the strings calls for nothing but commendation.

To Mr. Paur's reading of the great "Leonore" overture we would only apply the pudding test. No doubt his conception of the work is amply defensible—on paper or viva voce; but, to the ear, it does not defend itself. It was thoroughly ineffective and, what was still worse, ineffective at the expense of great seeming effort. The trouble was not only that Mr. Paur's frequent changes of speed broke up the composition into small sections, thus destroying all continuity of impression, but that each change, in itself, seemed too purely voluntary, made with a set and conscious purpose, instead of impressing one as the immediate, uncontrollable expression of a momentary emotion. This constant shifting of the tempo seems to work more ruin in Beethoven than in almost any other composer in the whole list; these sudden fits of piu mosso and meno mosso affect one much like Laputan flappers, intended to act as a filip to the languishing attention of an audience. The born and bred Laputan, immersed in his own lofty musings, needed the application of the flapper, to remind him that conversation was going forward to which it were well for him to attend; but to us, already interested and absorbed in the conversation, as we are, the flapper is a mere unwelcome interruption, calling our attention to nothing but itself. These effects make a mosaic out of a work that in itself is no mosaic at all, but rather a constant organic development, a growing of something stronger and more vital out of something already strong and vital that precedes it; it is this continuous growth that, as much as anything else, gives the work its enormous dramatic interest and impressiveness. Break it up into disjointed sections, and the music loses all its momentum; every section has to make a fresh start for itself, at an incalculable loss of energy. The advocates of this over-elaborate and mis-called "expressive" style of interpreting Beethoven are fond of speaking of the opposite, to our mind more natural, method as "barrel-organ grinding!" To this we would only oppose the suggestion that "interpreting" Beethoven is at least as apposite a term for what they like so much: for, in listening to a discourse through the medium of an interpreter, one may get an understanding of its meaning, but the process is so laborious that the native flavor, aroma and fire of it are all but inevitably lost.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY.

A Charming Programme Ably Rendered.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was given:

Symphony in F major, op. 9.....H. Goetz
Serenade for strings in D minor, op. 36.....Volkmann

(Cello solo by Mr. Alwin Schroeder.)
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3.....Beethoven

The Goetz Symphony was first performed in this country by the Philharmonic Orchestra at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Jan. 8, 1880. Later in the same month the Harvard Orchestra played it in Boston. It has also been played by Gerike in March, 1887, and Nikisch in November, 1888. This symphony shows the hand of the scholarly composer, for its polyphony is admirable. It is replete with beautiful melodies and is scored in the modern vein. The Intermezzo is the most pleasing and the most original movement of the work. It was delightfully played by the orchestra.

The Adagio comes next in interest and originality, but it is rather prolonged in the working out. The lively poetic theme at the beginning of this movement was too loudly given out by the strings, and its delicacy and sentiment were thus marred. There is contrast in plenty in this movement, but it requires a more delicate touch and a more exacting gradation of dynamics to display its full values in shading than our new conductor has shown thus far in his interpretations. The first movement and the last movement are specimens of the fine musicianship of the composer, and though not particularly melodious at length, are spirited and brilliant in their development. In the last movement one is reminded forcibly of Schumann.

This symphony is of sufficient calibre to cause one to regret that its composer should have died so early in life, which event took place in 1876, in his 35th year, from overwork caused by poverty.

The Volkmann Serenade, which has been heard in Boston several times since its first production by the Philharmonic Orchestra in 1879 is a delightful composition, full of romance, and graceful in its setting for the instruments. The solo was delightfully played by Mr. Schroeder, and the orchestra in its efforts displayed the remarkable delicacy and precision for which it is so justly famous. The audience was enraptured with the performance.

Mr. Paur scored a great success in his conception of the Beethoven overture, and in the magnificent rendering, the result of his masterly conducting of the orchestra in the delineation of his conception was apparent. It was dramatic in the extreme and showed that he is possessed of a musical temperament that must in the course of his career here display some rare qualities and stamp him as a musician of deep emotions. Rarely, if ever, has this noble overture been so wonderfully interpreted in our concert halls. The audience recognized this fact with

Mr. Paur constantly impresses his listeners that he is a musician earnest and serious in his work, of high musical instincts, and a large degree of feeling, with the ability and determination necessary to have the renderings correspond to his conception and desires. His work shows evidence of virility, and is marked by a most careful effort as regards his ideas of the expression of the piece. His beat is firm and intelligent, and the players respond readily to its indications. As a conductor he is infinitely the superior of his immediate predecessor, and when he shall have gained a better defined gradation of dynamics, and more repose at times, the playing of the orchestra will in its effect approach closely the wonderful perfection that marked its efforts under Mr. Gericke.

Mr. Paur has already gained the highest regard of his critical listeners because of his sterling qualities. The concert on Saturday evening was of a most happy length. Next Saturday evening the programme will present the symphony in F-minor, by Richard Strauss: the Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. Mrs. Emma Eames will be the soloist. WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|------------------|--|
| RICHARD STRAUSS. | SYMPHONY in F minor, op. 12.
I. Allegro ma non troppo. un poco maestoso
II. Scherzo: Presto.—Trio: l'Istesso tempo.
III. Andante cantabile.
IV. Allegro assai, molto appassionato. |
| MASSENET. | RECITATIVE. "De cet affreux combat," and ARIA
"Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from "Le Cid." |
| SAINT-SAËNS. | SYMPHONIC POEM. "Le Rouet d'Omphale." op. 31 |
| GLUCK. | ARIA, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide." |
| BRAHMS. | AKADEMISCHE FEST-OUVERTURE, in
C minor, op. 80. |

Soloist:

MME. EMMA EAMES.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

92 tremendous applause.

Mr. Paur constantly impresses his listeners that he is a musician earnest and serious in his work, of high musical instincts, and a large degree of feeling, with the ability and determination necessary to have the renderings correspond to his conception and desires. His work shows evidence of virility, and is marked by a most careful effort as regards his ideas of the expression of the piece. His beat is firm and intelligent, and the players respond readily to its indications. As a conductor he is infinitely the superior of his immediate predecessor, and when he shall have gained a better defined gradation of dynamics, and more repose at times, the playing of the orchestra will in its effect approach closely the wonderful perfection that marked its efforts under Mr. Gericke.

Mr. Paur has already gained the highest regard of his critical listeners because of his sterling qualities. The concert on Saturday evening was of a most happy length. Next Saturday evening the programme will present the symphony in F minor, by Richard Strauss; the Symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saens; and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture. Mrs. Emma Eames will be the soloist.
WARREN DAVENPORT.

23
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

RICHARD STRAUSS.	SYMPHONY in F minor, op. 12. I. Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso II. Scherzo: Presto.—Trio: l'istesso tempo. III. Andante cantabile. IV. Allegro assai, molto appassionato.
MASSENET.	RECITATIVE, "De cet affreux combat," and ARIA "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from "Le Cid."
SAINT-SAËNS.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," op. 31
GLUCK.	ARIA, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide."
BRAHMS.	AKADEMISCHE FEST-OUVERTURE, in C minor, op. 80.

Soloist:

MME. EMMA EAMES.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Richard Strauss: Symphony in F minor, Opus 12.
 Massenet: Recitative, "De cet affreux combat," and Aria, "Pleurez! pleurez, mes yeux," from "Le Cid."
 Saint-Saëns: Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," in A major, Opus 31.
 Gluck: Aria, "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide."
 Brahms: Akademische Fest-Ouverture, in C minor, Opus 80.

Mme. Emma Eames was the singer.

It is not often that a full-fledged symphony, written by a boy of sixteen is published in full score and publicly performed several thousand miles away from home thirteen years after it was composed! No matter what may be thought of the absolute value of this F minor symphony of Richard Strauss's, this much may surely be said of it: that it has had the power to induce an intelligent and experienced conductor to give it before a presumably intelligent and experienced audience as something worth listening to; few boys of sixteen have got so far as this! As for the work itself, it is almost needless to say that it bears many marks of the composer's youthfulness. One feels, in listening to it, that here is a young man, just through with, or still in the midst of, his academic training, anxious to turn what he has learned to practical account, yet ambitious to show that he has artistic aspirations above and beyond mere academic respectability; the former is shown by the immediate and oft-recurring employment of polyphonic, or contrapuntal, devices, the latter by the freedom with which these devices are used and by the generally romantic and emotional character of the themes themselves. Another youthful trait is the evident desire the composer evinces to follow Liszt's not entirely unquestionable advice, "tachez toujours de faire grand!"—always try to do things on a large scale!—advice which, when followed, often results in the young composer's putting all his eggs recklessly into one basket. Of that other youthful trait, the highest and noblest of all, the one which led the late Julius Eichberg to cry out in admiration at the young Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony: "Oh, glorious youth! with all its illusions still intact, and its whole-souled faith in them!"—of this fine youthful audacity, that does not yet know itself audacious, Strauss has shown little, save in the last movement of his work; but in the finale he does grasp at the thunder with a will, and his daring is well rewarded. With all its turgidity, its excessiveness and indulgence in "stunning" effects, the finale is out and out the best of the four movements; it has the most of real vitality, of convincing force; you feel that it was written in the composer's very heart's blood and that he believed every note of it with a belief profounder and more efficacious than comes from mere intellectual conviction. Here, if anywhere in the symphony, is true inspiration; not of the highest, not even of a very high, kind, but genuine, vital, and of a sort to give the young composer a fulcrum whereon to rest the lever of his cleverness. One may smile at it now and then,—indeed one is impelled to do a good deal of smiling in the course of the whole symphony,—but it is with a kindly and withal sympathetic smile, free from cynicism. Of the other three movements, the Scherzo seems the best; the Andante cantabile, on the other hand, is plainly the weakest; that fourth theme, molto tranquillo e dolce, with its skips of a tenth and its wild tessings about from violins to basses in a sort of free, double-counterpoint, bespeaks a lacking, or undeveloped, sense of humor in the composer, blinding his eyes to the difference between sentiment and bathos. Upon the whole, this youthful work gives one a rather regretful feeling as one compares it with what Strauss has since given to the world, and considers into what paths the further development of his talent has led him; how, starting from this point, his technique in composition has developed itself almost solely in the more purely physical direction of orchestration, while it has remained stationary or even retrograded in the higher, intellectual matter of thematic development and coherence of musical structure; how that fine youthful enthusiasm that lent life and vigor to his Finale has not become more sane, but has grown rank and overshadowed almost all else in him. This F minor symphony falls far short of being a great work, but it stands at the beginning of a path that should have led to better and more wholesome things than the "Don Juan," "Francesca da Rimini" and "The Tempest."

Saint-Saëns's winsome "Rouet d'Omphale" was admirably played: with life, delicacy and constant effectiveness. But the stroke of the evening was Brahms's Academic Overture; we have been following Mr. Paur carefully and with unfeigned interest from the beginning of the season, and have found much in him to admire: his artistic honesty, his freedom from affectation of any sort, his singleness of musical purpose, his skill in getting technically fine and exact playing out of his orchestra. And now, with the Academic Overture, he has shown that, beside possessing all these good qualities, "he has it in him!" By "it" we mean the most important, the crowning quality of all, the one which, without the others, does not go far, to be sure, but without which the others have no real artistic significance: Magnetism, vital force, a touch of the divine spark! We suspected him of it in Volkmann's "Richard III." overture, but were not quite sure of our affair; now we are sure of it. Never in our recollection has this overture of Brahms's produced such an effect. Think of it! here was Brahms—and in a not universally admired work, too—played with all due sanity, without any striving after unworthy, meretricious, or merely skin-deep effect yet so played as to be perfectly clear to a general audience and to whirl that audience up to the highest pitch of excitement and enthusiasm! The performance was masterly, and better!

Before speaking more particularly of Mme. Eames's singing, we cannot help dwelling a little on one, as it seems to us, noteworthy feature in her participation in the concert. Here is a young and already famous prima donna—one of a class not noted for self-effacing artistic virtues—coming to sing at a concert at which she knows (or might know) she will be the principal, if not the only, attraction in the eyes of the whole "surplus" of the audience, that all the standing room will be filled with people who have come to hear her, and for little else. And what does she do? She chooses two songs that have nothing to recommend them to an audience save their intrinsic musical value; songs to be sung with all sincerity of artistic purpose, with all purity and nobility of style, but upon which no singer's ingenuity could hang one bit of extraneous, unworthy effectiveness, songs which even lack some of the most powerful as well as the most artistically legitimate elements of musical effectiveness. Neither of her two selections ends with the least attempt at a climax,—the Massenet piece even closes with an imperfect cadence,—neither of them give the singer any opportunity for vocal display; moreover, neither of them are at all familiar to our public. To be sure, Massenet's "Pleurez! pleurez!" is in a style which has become fairly popular of late years; the public have learned to understand and like that sort of thing. But this can hardly be said of Gluck's "Ah! si la liberté!," it has no merely "popular" side whatever; in fact, there are but few cities in the world where any opera of Gluck's has managed to hold the stage, save by the classic artistic plety of a small portion of the public. Now, when an artist like Mme. Eames chooses two such songs for her first appearance before a large general public, and at a concert, too, where there is no hope of an "encore," it looks very much as if she chose them simply because she found them intrinsically fine music, well worth the singing, without regard for what the audience might think of them; no singer could have chosen either of them with an eye to the applause it might reap. Few operatic prima donnas will consent to take such a course, even when urged thereto; very few, indeed, will take it of their own free will. In this Mme. Eames has shown that she takes herself seriously, as an artist of high aim. This is as it should be; bravissima!

90

If we cannot quite agree with her admiration for the Massenet song, for, saving the fine outburst of passion near the middle, we can find little in it, we can heartily sympathize with her in choice of the Gluck aria. Massenet wrote his "Cid" when he had already entered upon the downward path of half-hearted composing which has since led his remarkable talent into a slough of third-rateness; the "Pleurez! pleurez!" seems a most indistinct, desultory piece of writing; it is melodically so vague that one recognizes the return of the theme more by the words than by the music—one forgets what the theme was before the thing is half over. But it is expressive, to a certain degree dramatic, in its musical illustration of the text. It needs great singing to make anything out of it at all. Gluck's "Ah! si la liberté!" on the other hand, is divinely beautiful, replete with that warmth which even his rather academic rigidity of expression could not wholly hide. Its expression is too measured, too contained, to allow it to appeal very forcibly to most listeners today; but it is genuine, noble music through and through; there is true genius in it. Mme. Eames sang both songs very beautifully indeed; with admirable "school," purity of style, beauty of voice and feeling.

In a word, she sang them artistically. In the matter of effectiveness something was undeniably wanting; there were moments, such as the passage, "Tu ne saurais jamais conduire qu'aux chemins glorieux." in the song from "Le Cid," when you were carried away unresisting; but in others one could not but feel that the music could be more forcibly put. We have heard Mme. Eames a good deal, and think we know pretty well what is in her; to our mind what was lacking of supreme effectiveness in her singing last Saturday evening is to be charged to one thing, and to one thing only: to a want of routine. There is a certain power the long habit of being constantly under fire gives a singer or player, which nothing else will give; it is this peculiar power one finds in most "old stagers," and there is no royal road to acquiring it; no amount of practice away from an audience can give it, genius itself cannot anticipate it. It will come from nothing but years of constant—not merely occasional—facing an audience. This routine-power is just what Mme. Eames as yet lacks; all else she seems to have in pretty generous measure. The audience greeted her singing of the Massenet song with the warmest enthusiasm, and she was thrice recalled; the Gluck aria seems to be more caviare to them.

The next programme (for Friday afternoon, Nov. 17, and Saturday evening, Nov. 18, there is no concert this week) is: Mozart, symphony in C major ("Jupiter"); Brahms, double concerto for violin and 'cello; Haydn, symphony in D major. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder the 'cellist.

AFTER DINNER

Many a person who sat in the audience at Music Hall and applauded the stately looking, beautiful singer, who was the soloist of the Symphony Concert last evening recalled the days when this same woman was a girl here in Boston, just preparing for her career.

Emma Eames's first church position was at the Dudley Street Baptist Church, a tall-spired edifice, familiar to every one who takes the Warren Street route into Roxbury, as it stands high above the street, and approached by a double flight of steps, just at the left of Warren Street as one crosses Dudley.

At that time Charlie Capen, well known as a musical critic, was the organist at that church. They were trying soprano voices to fill a vacancy in the choir, and Emma Eames was one of sixteen candidates. She had a beautiful voice in those days, but she did not read very readily, and, though the organist was somewhat attracted by her singing, the Church Committee had about decided to engage another woman. Capen went out into the vestibule, where the aspirants were waiting, to speak to the singer who had been selected, and to tell her that she was pretty sure of the place, when he was intercepted by Miss Eames. She stepped in front of him, and, smiling, with her young and handsome face aglow with animation, asked:

"What do you think of my voice?"

"I think it is a beautiful voice, Miss Eames," answered the organist, "but you don't read well, and I am afraid the committee have decided in favor of some one else."

Her face did not fall. With the same bright smile she replied:

"Yes, I know, but I am very anxious to get the position, and I am willing to work. Couldn't you say a word for me, since you like my voice?"

The organist was quite overcome by the presence of the girl and by her voice, as many another man has been since. He turned about. Without saying a word to the singer who had been so near success, he went back to the committee. There he expatiated on Miss Eames's voice. He acknowledged that she did not read well, but he pledged himself to be responsible that she should come to church with the service prepared, though he was a busy man, with his time fully occupied with the teaching and writing that brought him in his livelihood. This characteristic circumstance may be taken as a sample of Emma Eames's irresistible personality even in the days of her callow youth.

Her experiences in that choir were even more characteristic. She had about as much idea of the etiquette of going to church as a frolicksome kitten, and she was perfectly irresponsible. She was afraid of no one, and seemed to laugh at some ideas of propriety. What she thought, she had to speak at once, place and time of no account, or run the risk of bursting. She followed that policy in the choir. In spite of the commands of her mother, who at that time was always with her, in defiance of the prayers of the organist her comments during the service were liberal and amusing, and often disastrous to the propriety of the organ loft.

"I have a fair sample in mind. Right in the midst of a sermon she turned to the organist, who was listening sedately to the minister, and whispered: "I say, Mr. Capen, I've found out what the Baptist belief is."

"Sh," admonished the organist; but it was useless, her discovery had to be ventilated before she could stop, and her next sentence had a very Gilbertian sound to the good deacon who sat near enough to catch her reply.

Of course there was a great row in the church, and Miss Eames's resignation was wanted at once. Again the organist leaped boldly into the breach. He reminded the deacons that the girl was very young; that she meant no harm; that he would himself be responsible for her future good behavior. Then he went to her and tried to put her on her honor to quit nonsense during service. She made no more expositions of her discoveries in regard to creeds, but there were greater breakers than that ahead.

She ceased to be universal in her attentions to the choir, and confined her confidences and her glances to the tenor, simply because he was the man nearest at hand. This was more disastrous still, for, to use the words of the organist, "she mashed every tenor I got." Her youth was running over with buoyant spirits, and her glee and sportive temperament were contagious. As fast as a tenor got broken in she broke him up. Twelve tenors had been tried and none could be kept, for this reason, when Capen went to George Lennon, Mathilde Lennon's brother, who wanted a church position, and said to him:

97

"See here, George, we're in a terrible box up at the church. We've got a soprano who sings very well. I think she has a great voice, and a future, and I want to keep her. But every tenor that sings with her gets rattled. Now do come and be a sensible fellow. Don't let her get away with you, and it'll be a personal favor to me."

Lennon agreed to keep his head.

Then Capen went to his pretty soprano. "Now, Miss Eames," he begged, "please don't flirt with Lennon. Do give the church some show," and she looked as innocent as you please of his meaning, but promised. For several Sundays everything went well. The anxious fellow on the organ bench began to breathe easily. Then came a baptismal service. Miss Eames had never seen anything of the sort, and was all azog. She began her funny talk in short whispers to the tenor, and as a result when they rose for the baptismal hymn the tenor started on the wrong hymn, and the choir were all in a mix. That was bad enough, but worse remained behind. Miss Eames was craning her neck to see the minister and the candidate walk down into the font, and much more interested in that than in her share of the service. When the candidate was tipped back for the dip her mouth opened, and a ripple of soprano laughter swept from the choir gallery over the heads of the shocked congregation. That settled it. The organist shivered. He had done all he could, but there was no apology possible for that.

It had been Capen who put her in the choir. It had been Capen that kept her there. It had to be Capen who would accept the situation. He dreaded it, but it had to be done. She must go. But he set himself to soften the dismissal. It happened that he knew that Bob Clouston was looking for a soprano, and as quickly as he could he went to him and induced him to engage Miss Eames. Then he went to her mother and said: "Madam, your daughter does not behave well enough to sing in a Baptist Church, but perhaps she will be all right in a Unitarian Church." And she was, for she stayed there three years.

I wonder as she watched the beat of Faur last night if any recollections of that other conductor who had believed in her came back. Or if, as she passed the first violins, any vision haunted her of that gifted fellow who so admired the singer, and who, when she first sang at the Symphony, was one of the marked men of the orchestra.

Lichtenberg was a stoic, a philosopher, a woman hater. How deep his regard went for Eames no one knew. He left the Symphony Orchestra under the displeasure of Gericke for an offense committed by another violinist who had not the courage to own up and protect a fellow musician. But there were plenty to believe that at the root of Gericke's displeasure was not that laugh that disturbed the rehearsal, but the fact that the fair Eames had smiled on the violinist, and possibly the recollection of those evenings when they had tried to sit one another out in that modest little parlor on Mt. Vernon Street.

Lichtenberg was a clever fellow in those days, but when a man of his gifts believes in nothing, not even in himself; when such a man is not troubled with ambition, and does not especially value the God-given gifts he possesses, it is not uncommon that he is forgotten. When Lichtenberg first appeared here as a soloist, there were those who fancied they saw ahead of this lad, who had begun as a street musician and ended as the most magnetic fellow in the Symphony Orchestra, a great future. Though he is still in New York, and devoting himself to teaching at Mrs. Thurber's school, he is well-nigh forgotten here by the very men who once envied him.

Life is a complex problem. Cause and effect are not always easy to follow. But I wondered as Mme. Story stood in Music Hall last night, if wilful memory brought any of these things back to her.

VOLNAY.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY.

A Novelty Presented in all Strauss Symphony.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday evening at Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12. Richard Strauss.
Recitative and Aria, Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux, from Le Cid. Massenet
Omphale's Spinning Wheel, Symphonic Poem, op. 31. Saint-Saens
Aria, Ah! si la liberte, from Armide. Gluck
Academic Festival-overture, op. 80. Brahms

Mrs. Emma Eames was the soloist. The novelty on the programme was the Strauss symphony, abounding in interest, both as regards its construction and the masterly manner in which the composer wields the orchestra. There is a multiplicity of themes in the work, many of which were original and beautiful. The work is bewildering in the variety of its manner, for it avoids the traditional form in its development; that is in the conservative, consecutive form of the working out. It presents, instead, in the most part, alternating characteristics that produce surprising effects, which, at the same time, keep within the bounds of rational development, although of short duration, often.

In the first movement and in the last also, occur, however, some prolonged and complete handling of subjects in a free form that exhibits remarkable resources on the part of the composer as regards knowledge and invention in the matter of the broader forms of composition. It is difficult, however, to speak critically of this long and intricate work at one hearing. The Scherzo is unmistakably original, brilliant and buoyant. The Andante Cantabile also has its beauties, but one's interest flags in the rather tedious length of the movement, for it seems as if the composer could have said all much more briefly and to the point as well. There can be no two opinions among competent musicians regarding the ability of Strauss in the matter of his employment of the orchestra. He is simply a master of orchestral resources. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for the opportunity of listening to this youthful composer's first symphony.

The only question is will this composer develop as he grows older the high classical model of symphonic writing, or will his tendency be toward the free-fantasy mode of composition. With his originality and wonderful resources it is to be hoped that he will take the former path and thereby make an enduring fame. It is an easy matter for a composer of knowledge and inventive skill to make music in the latter form. To rise above the Cappelmeister and succeed in the former, however, calls for more than a remarkable talent; it demands spontaneous genius. The orchestra played the symphony in the most brilliant manner under the exacting baton of Conductor Paur. The most ardent admirer of Mr. Nikisch could not have asked for a more overloud and violent performance on the part of the brass wind at times, or for a more thundering noise than came from the tympani player. If Conductor Paur will but raise such a din at his debut in New York this week he will be sure to please the critics of that city and establish himself solidly in their favor.

The performance of the Saint-Saens poem was a most delightful experience, and Mr. Paur showed that he is possessed of delicate sentiment when he cares to display it. In the Brahms overture the wind instruments often overpowered the strings when the latter should have been more prominent.

Mrs. Eames sang her numbers in an artistic and unaffected manner. At the great climax in the Massenet selection she rose to a fine height. Also the simplicity of her rendering of the aria of Gluck is to be praised. The discriminating critic only wishes that her voice-training had been of the kind that would enable her to present her naturally fine voice at its best, and to serve in prolonging her career upon the stage.

The erratic movements that are painfully apparent to the critical ear in the employment of her voice are not encouraging evidences, however. Mr. Paur conducted the accompaniments with skill and discretion. His work generally on this occasion must have encouraged those most in doubt concerning his ability to feel that he is the right man after all for the position he holds. There will be no concert next Saturday evening. On the Saturday following the programme will embrace Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; Haydn's symphony in D major, and the double concerto for violin and violoncello by Brahms. Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloists in the latter piece.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Symphony audience found itself in a not unusual predicament last night. For it ought to make up its mind as to whether or not it liked Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, which it had just heard for the first time. So everybody waited for his neighbor and looked furtively for a sign of approbation or disapprobation upon some trustworthily critical face. And, again as usual, the little waiting space after each movement was consumed in this unprofitable delay, and the symphony had to round out its vehement finale in order to extract something like real applause from an audience which had undoubtedly enjoyed the work more than it dared to intimate.

For this composition is independent enough to suit even a constitutional clamorer after something new, and it is full of surprises, the most of which are pleasant ones, although some are most eminent for their rough strength and untrammelled power. Melody it has in profusion—melody always obvious, often brief, generally graceful, sometimes piquant and occasionally sombre, dirge-like or grave as the theme of a chorale. Its rhythms are marked, and in the scherzo they are alternated with almost startling unexpectedness. The tone-color, derived from the full modern orchestra, including the bass tuba but without the fanciful percussion instruments,—is very varied and often exceedingly rich and deep. Sometimes one thinks of Wagner when the extreme high tones of the violins and wooden wind are used, or again when the brass comes rushing and crashing in; but generally the instrumentation smacks of originality. Contrasts of theme and treatment abound, particularly in the scherzo and last movement, in which latter gentle soft measures are confronted by tremendous and dissonant outbursts. The slow movement is of a romantic character and contains no fewer than four distinct themes, most of which are decidedly sentimental, while one is a short, strenuous trumpet call. The general style of composition is rather free than formal, and no movement is so long as to permit a full regulation development of its thematic material. The scherzo is quite fascinating, with its fluttering, fairy-like figures and the march swing of the finale has a triumphal progress and voluminousness.

The other instrumental numbers were old friends—Saint-Saens's "Rouet d'Omphale" and Brahms's "Academic" overture, the latter ending the programme, which had begun with the symphony. The playing was admirable all through the concert, and often rose to something closely akin to real enthusiasm, especially in the stronger movements of the symphony and at the end of the overture. The over-firm accentuation of prominent phrases had been greatly modified, and the orchestra showed their nearer approach to the easy elasticity which marks ideal playing. There was surely no lack of finesse in the "Spinning Wheel," and when fire and force were needed they glowed and swelled.

Between these numbers Mrs. Emma Eames-Story sang two large airs of love, grief and desolation, which were the "Pleurez, mes yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," and "Ah, si la liberte me doit etre ravie," from the "Armide" of Gluck. With such melancholy strains she could not expect to procure popular plaudits, although she did obtain appreciative recalls. But the rich quality and even scale of her voice, her smooth perfected style and her dignified quietude, were remarked with pleasure, and one felt that in choosing such music from her standard and classic repertory, she had paid a compliment to the supposed high taste of her audience. If any one term were to be chosen to express the chief element of her singing, it might be calm elegance; for depth, warmth and passion it certainly did not betray, and the hearer would never guess that the firm, smooth, balanced phrases were meant to illustrate the passion of a heroine bidding her eyes to "weep all their tears," or wondering if the "too fatal foe of her life's happiness" were to hold her enslaved.

There will be no concert next week, but on the following Saturday the programme will consist of Mozart's "Jupiter," and Haydn's D-major symphonies, together with Brahms's double concerto for violin and cello, to be played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur is showing rare good judgment in his programmes for the symphony concerts of the Boston orchestra, and he is gaining especial praise for putting the symphony where it belongs, first on the programme.

Last evening's concert opened with the symphony in F minor, op. 12, by Richard Strauss, which was given a reading quite in keeping with its brilliancy and wealth of orchestral coloring. The dainty scherzo was made a thing of airy grace by the band, and no better work in this class of composition has been heard here in many a day. The broad, strong themes of the final movement were brought out with splendid force by the reading given it, and the audience was led to realize all the beauties of this notable example of modern day writing.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," made the central number in the orchestral selections, and gave a sharply contrasting element to the symphony and the academic overture by Brahms which ended the programme. The poem was made a tone picture of rare beauty by the performance given it, and the finale developed the fact that Theodore Thomas has a rival in producing pianissimo effects in the person of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra.

The Academic overture was read and played with splendid intelligence, and all of its intricacies were given with a rare clearness, making a brilliant ending for the concert.

Mme. Eames was the soloist, and sang the Massenet recitative, "De cet affreux combat," and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from "Le Cid," as well as the Gluck aria, "Ah! si la liberte," from "Armide."

Although Mme. Eames lacks the warmth and emotional expression demanded for entire success upon the concert stage, she has much that wins her the commendation of the most critical, and in both the selections named she sang in a delightfully unaffected fashion. The Massenet aria is admirably suited to display her vocal gifts and she gave great enjoyment by her singing of this aria. The severely classical aria of Gluck were given with charming simplicity and directness, its phrasing and delivery quite disarming criticism. The singer was heartily welcomed and as heartily applauded after each of her appearances.

The first of the season's tours of the orchestra will occur during the coming week, and the concerts will be resumed on Saturday, the 18th inst., when Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder will be the soloists.

98
those evenings when they had tried to sit one another out in that modest little parlor on Mt. Vernon Street.

Lichtenberg was a clever fellow in those days, but when a man of his gifts believes in nothing, not even in himself; when such a man is not troubled with ambition, and does not especially value the God-given gifts he possesses, it is not uncommon that he is forgotten. When Lichtenberg first appeared here as a soloist, there were those who fancied they saw ahead of this lad, who had begun as a street musician and ended as the most magnetic fellow in the Symphony Orchestra, a great future. Though he is still in New York, and devoting himself to teaching at Mrs. Thurber's school, he is well-nigh forgotten here by the very men who once envied him.

Life is a complex problem. Cause and effect are not always easy to follow. But I wondered as Mme. Story stood in Music Hall last night, if wilful memory brought any of these things back to her.

VOLNAY.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY.

A Novelty Presented in all Strauss Symphony.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday evening at Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12.

Richard Strauss.
Recitative and Aria, Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux, from Le Cid. Massenet
Omphale's Spinning Wheel, Symphonic Poem, op. 31. Saint-Saens
Aria, Ah! si la liberté, from Armide. Gluck
Academic Festival-overture, op. 80. Brahms

Mrs. Emma Eames was the soloist.

The novelty on the programme was the Strauss symphony, abounding in interest, both as regards its construction and the masterly manner in which the composer wields the orchestra. There is a multiplicity of themes in the work, many of which were original and beautiful. The work is bewildering in the variety of its manner, for it avoids the traditional form in its development, that is in the conservative, consecutive form of the working out. It presents, instead, in the most part, alternating characteristics that produce surprising effects, which, at the same time, keep within the bounds of rational development, although of short duration, often.

In the first movement and in the last also, occur, however, some prolonged and complete handling of subjects in a free form that exhibits remarkable resources on the part of the composer as regards knowledge and invention in the matter of the broader forms of composition. It is difficult, however, to speak critically of this long and intricate work at one hearing. The Scherzo is unmistakably original, brilliant and buoyant. The Andante Cantabile also has its beauties, but one's interest flags in the rather tedious length of the movement, for it seems as if the composer could have said all much more briefly and to the point as well. There can be no two opinions among competent musicians regarding the ability of Strauss in the matter of his employment of the orchestra. He is simply a master of orchestral resources. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for the opportunity of listening to this youthful composer's first symphony.

The only question is will this composer develop as he grows older the high classical model of symphonic writing, or will his tendency be toward the free-fantasia mode of composition. With his originality and wonderful resources it is to be hoped that he will take the former path and thereby make an enduring fame. It is an easy matter for a composer of knowledge and inventive skill to make music in the latter form. To rise above the Cappelmeister and succeed in the former, however, calls for more than a remarkable talent; it demands spontaneous genius. The orchestra played the symphony in the most brilliant manner under the exacting baton of Conductor Paur. The most ardent admirer of Mr. Nikisch could not have asked for a more overloud and violent performance on the part of the brass wind at times, or for a more thundering noise than came from the tympani player. If Conductor Paur will but raise such a din at his debut in New York this week he will be sure to please the critics of that city and establish himself solidly in their favor.

The performance of the Saint-Saens poem was a most delightful experience, and Mr. Paur showed that he is possessed of delicate sentiment when he cares to display it. In the Brahms overture the wind instruments often overpowered the strings when the latter should have been more prominent.

Mrs. Eames sang her numbers in an artistic and unaffected manner. At the great climax in the Massenet selection she rose to a fine height. Also the simplicity of her rendering of the aria of Gluck is to be praised. The discriminating critic only wishes that her voice-training had been of the kind that would enable her to present her naturally fine voice at its best, and to serve in prolonging her career upon the stage.

The erratic movements that are painfully apparent to the critical ear in the employment of her voice are not encouraging evidences, however. Mr. Paur conducted the accompaniments with skill and discretion. His work generally on this occasion must have encouraged those most in doubt concerning his ability to feel that he is the right man after all for the position he holds. There will be no concert next Saturday evening. On the Saturday following the programme will embrace Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony; Haydn's symphony in D major, and the double concerto for violin and violoncello by Brahms. Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the soloists in the latter piece.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Symphony audience found itself in a not unusual predicament last night. For it ought to make up its mind as to whether or not it liked Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, which it had just heard for the first time. So everybody waited for his neighbor and looked furtively for a sign of approbation or disapprobation upon some trustworthily critical face. And, again as usual, the little waiting space after each movement was consumed in this unprofitable delay, and the symphony had to round out its vehement finale in order to extract something like real applause from an audience which had undoubtedly enjoyed the work more than it dared to intimate.

For this composition is independent enough to suit even a constitutional clamorer after something new, and it is full of surprises, the most of which are pleasant ones, although some are most eminent for their rough strength and untrammeled power. Melody it has in profusion—melody always obvious, often brief, generally graceful, sometimes piquant and occasionally sombre, dirge-like or grave as the theme of a chorale. Its rhythms are marked, and in the scherzo they are alternated with almost startling unexpectedness. The tone-color, derived from the full modern orchestra, including the bass tuba but without the fanciful percussion instruments,—is very varied and often exceedingly rich and deep. Sometimes one thinks of Wagner when the extreme high tones of the violins and wooden wind are used, or again when the brass comes rushing and crashing in; but generally the instrumentation smacks of originality. Contrasts of theme and treatment abound, particularly in the scherzo and last movement, in which latter gentle soft measures are confronted by tremendous and dissonant outbursts. The slow movement is of a romantic character and contains no fewer than four distinct themes, most of which are decidedly sentimental, while one is a short, strenuous trumpet call. The general style of composition is rather free than formal, and no movement is so long as to permit a full regulation development of its thematic material. The scherzo is quite fascinating, with its fluttering, fairy-like figures and the march swing of the finale has a triumphal progress and voluminousness.

The other instrumental numbers were old friends—Saint-Saens's "Rouet d'Omphale" and Brahms's "Academic" overture, the latter ending the programme, which had begun with the symphony. The playing was admirable all through the concert, and often rose to something closely akin to real enthusiasm, especially in the stronger movements of the symphony and at the end of the overture. The over-firm accentuation of prominent phrases had been greatly modified, and the orchestra showed their nearer approach to the easy elasticity which marks ideal playing. There was surely no lack of finesse in the "Spinning Wheel," and when fire and force were needed they glowed and swelled.

Between these numbers Mrs. Emma Eames-Story sang two large airs of love, grief and desolation, which were the "Pleurez, mes yeux," from Massenet's "Cid," and "Ah, si la liberté me dolle etre ravie," from the "Armide" of Gluck. With such melancholy strains she could not expect to procure popular plaudits, although she did obtain appreciative recalls. But the rich quality and even scale of her voice, her smooth perfected style and her dignified quietude, were remarked with pleasure, and one felt that in choosing such music from her standard and classic repertory, she had paid a compliment to the supposed high taste of her audience. If any one term were to be chosen to express the chief element of her singing, it might be calm elegance; for depth, warmth and passion it certainly did not betray, and the hearer would never guess that the firm, smooth, balanced phrases were meant to illustrate the passion of a heroine bidding her eyes to "weep all their tears," or wondering if the "too fatal foe of her life's happiness" were to hold her enslaved.

99

There will be no concert next week, but on the following Saturday the programme will consist of Mozart's "Jupiter," and Haydn's D-major symphonies, together with Brahms's double concerto for violin and cello, to be played by Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur is showing rare good judgment in his programmes for the symphony concerts of the Boston orchestra, and he is gaining especial praise for putting the symphony where it belongs, first on the programme.

Last evening's concert opened with the symphony in F minor, op. 12, by Richard Strauss, which was given a reading quite in keeping with its brilliancy and wealth of orchestral coloring. The dainty scherzo was made a thing of airy grace by the band, and no better work in this class of composition has been heard here in many a day. The broad, strong themes of the final movement were brought out with splendid force by the reading given it, and the audience was led to realize all the beauties of this notable example of modern day writing.

Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," made the central number in the orchestral selections, and gave a sharply contrasting element to the symphony and the academic overture by Brahms which ended the programme. The poem was made a tone picture of rare beauty by the performance given it, and the finale developed the fact that Theodore Thomas has a rival in producing pianissimo effects in the person of the new conductor of the Boston orchestra.

The Academic overture was read and played with splendid intelligence, and all of its intricacies were given with charming clearness, making a brilliant ending for the concert.

Mme. Eames was the soloist, and sang the Massenet recitative, "De cet affreux combat," and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!" from "Le Cid," as well as the Gluck aria, "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide."

Although Mme. Eames lacks the warmth and emotional expression demanded for entire success upon the concert stage, she has much that wins her the commendation of the most critical, and in both the selections named she sang in a delightfully unaffected fashion. The Massenet aria is admirably suited to display her vocal gifts and she gave great enjoyment by her singing of this aria. The severely classical aria of Gluck were given with charming simplicity and directness, its phrasing and delivery quite disarming criticism. The singer was heartily welcomed and as heartily applauded after each of her appearances.

The first of the season's tours of the orchestra will occur during the coming week, and the concerts will be resumed on Saturday, the 18th inst., when Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder will be the soloists.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

For the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, in Music Hall, the selections were: Symphony, F minor, op. 12, Richard Strauss; "Pleurez mes yeux," from "Le Cid," Massenet; "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide," Gluck; and Academy Festival Overture, Brahms. The soloist was Mme. Emma Eames. The hall was packed, notwithstanding the unfavorable state of the weather. The Strauss symphony was heard here for the first time at this concert. It is a remarkable work for a young man not yet thirty years old. Its character is purely modern, and yet it is always interesting, despite an occasional tendency in the composer to prolixity. Its themes are very brief, but are strikingly melodious, and in their treatment the charm of tunefulness is never forgotten for any length of time, for even at his most recondite moments the composer recalls that he is not oblivious to the effect of grace and soulfulness. The work, as a whole, is original without having recourse to the current method of reaching that end through the vague and the extravagant. Very often the work suggests Mendelssohn, and sometimes Schumann, subjected to a process of extreme modernizing. The composer has a complete mastery over all the resources of modern orchestration, and his score is affluent in the richest and most impressive orchestral coloring. The opening movement is pervaded by a noble melancholy and holds the attention and the interest from beginning to end. The Scherzo is brilliantly new, and its orchestration is surprising in its intricacy, its piquancy and its effectiveness, while its clearness is delightful. The andante is dignified, but is perhaps something more labored in effect than are the other movements, and is prolonged beyond the capacity of its themes, to interest. It is immensely difficult, but was splendidly played. The finale is fiery and impassioned, and is worked out with great vigor and effect. Taken altogether, the symphony impressed us as among the very best that we have heard from the young composers of the new school. It was finely read and performed, and its interpretation afforded the most satisfying evidence that Mr. Paur has as yet given of his skill as a conductor, and of his command over his orchestra. The Saint-Saëns symphonic poem was exquisitely performed. It was possibly taken at too slow a tempo to bring out its characteristic swing, but the grace and the refinement of the reading and the warmth and beauty of its coloring were fairly fascinating. Mr. Paur continues to grow steadily in estimation, and it now seems beyond all question that he is a conductor who will wear well, and who is an acquisition of great value. Mme. Eames, who was welcomed heartily, sang the Massenet air very beautifully. Her lovely voice, her perfect tunefulness, the finish of her style, and her strong and chaste dramatic feeling made it very satisfying to listen to her. Her enunciation was clear, and the effort stamped her as a finished artist in music of this school. She fairly earned and deserved the applause and the four recalls that rewarded her. Vocally, her rendering of the Gluck air was faultless, but it was not a happy selection for her, as it requires a singer with a larger and more classic style than she possesses, to do it justice. It is a question, too, if the air is worth the singing. It is hopelessly antiquated, and it is not an example of the composer at his best. The principal fault in the interpretation was the discrepancy between the emphasis the artist gave the music at the expense of the sentiment of the words. She was warmly applauded and recalled after this effort. We must again pay tribute to the perfect and sympathetic manner in which Mr. Paur accompanies singers. The programme for the next concert, which will take place a week from next Saturday night, is, the "Jupiter" Symphony, Mozart; double concerto for violin and cello, Brahms, and Symphony in D, Haydn.

Emma Eames Soloist at the Fourth Symphony—Patti Soon to Sing in Boston.

Emma Eames was the soloist at the fourth symphony concert, and in consequence Music hall was uncomfortably crowded at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at last night's concert. Miss Eames is a great Boston favorite, alike in social and artistic circles, and the reception accorded her was demonstratively cordial. She sang three numbers, the recitative "De Cet Affreux Combat," and the aria "Pleurez! Pleurez mes Yeux!" from Massenet's opera "Le Cid," and the aria "Ah! Si la Liberté," from Gluck's opera "Armide."

In all of these selections, Miss Eames' rich and powerful voice was heard to excellent advantage, but it is probable that many in the audience would have been pleased to hear her sing something lighter. There is really no reason why a vocal soloist at the symphony concerts should confine herself to the severer class of music.

Miss Eames' voice is of wonderful purity and surpassing strength. It is smooth and clear throughout its extended range. Her execution is admirable, showing the best of schooling and the most artistic development of the rare gift bestowed upon her by nature. Miss Eames sang the recitative with a distinctness and expression that was thoroughly commendable. The arias were both sung with exquisite taste and expression, as well as strong dramatic effect.

A notable feature of the orchestra's offerings was the first performance here of Richard Strauss' symphony in F minor, op. 12. This is a very interesting work and contains some of the best and most original efforts of its talented composer. There are four movements and they are treated in a distinctly modern style. The orchestration is very elaborate and some strikingly unique effects are gained.

In the first movement heavy demands are made. A splendid interpretation was given by Mr. Paur.

Saint-Saëns' exquisite symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," was the especial treat of the orchestral selections. The dainty and graceful melodies were interpreted with delightful effect and expression. No work of this class has ever received more artistic performance from the symphony orchestra. Brahms' academic festival overture, splendidly played, was the final number of the very brilliant program.

There will be no concert this week. On Nov. 17 and 18 the program will be: Symphony in C major (Jupiter), Mozart; double concerto for violin and violoncello, Brahms; symphony in D major, Haydn; soloists, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

MUSIC.

The Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12..... Richard Strauss
Recitative and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!"
from "Le Cid"..... Massenet
Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale"..... Saint-Saëns
Aria, "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide"..... Gluck
Akademische Fest-Ouverture..... Brahms

Oh, Richard Strauss, son of the Munich horn-player, what do you mean by this symphony in which you speak for an hour?

Or one might put to you the question of Fontenelle to the sonata.

Had you really so much to say that you could not have expressed yourself in a symphonic poem of from 20 minutes to half an hour?

Your symphony is full of surprising things; there are oratorical graces and flourishes; there is the pessimism seen in your "Don Juan"; there is the virility of stormy youth;—but tell us now, in strict confidence, did you write the music because you could not keep it within you, or did you not often cudgel your brains for a fresh thought, while you padded cleverly here and there?

You write a scherzo characterized by ingenious instrumentation and abounding in sharp contrasts; you write an andante that contains beautiful music; and then you write a finale, where by the side of grand passages is melodramatic music, "sneak music," music that might fit the galloping hoois in "Held by the Enemy."

Your symphony is full of suggestion. To the dreamer it is a delight. But the stern pedagogue might argue with reason, that one of the better waltzes of Johann Strauss would be of greater benefit to the student.

There are forms of music that were once deemed inevitable by all; that are now approved by many; but will another generation of musicians work in these forms? Will the oratorio and the symphony incite the enthusiasm of the coming composers? You are a hyper-modern; you have already tried the symphonic poem; you have a gift of awaking thought in the hearer; but in this symphony you arrest the attention rather by the expression of your thought than by the thought itself.

You are a symbolist in music. Passages in this symphony might illustrate Verlaine, and Ghal, and Gustave Kahn. There are vague ideas, as in the first movement, and I am not prepared to deny that vague ideas full of suggestion are superior to clear ideas of triteness.

Your symphony is so long, so long. Your processions of knights, spectres, strange inhabitants of strange lands, women who would fain join them, but follow far behind, are never ending.

But let us have the symphony again, for you provoke curiosity, and in another mood the hearer might substitute large admiration for moderate rapture.

It was a pleasure to hear Mrs. Eames-Story. It was a pleasure to hear a woman who does not suffer from a severe attack of the German vocal mania; who does not court popular applause by pyrotechnical display; who is modest and dignified on the stage, free from grimaces, heedless of familiar faces while she sings. Mrs. Story sang the air from "Le Cid" in a sympathetic manner, without any affectation, without a trick. Her delivery was admirable throughout. The simplicity of her treatment of the air from "Armide" was equally worthy of praise. Sophie Arnould said of Rosalie LeVasseur, who created the part of Armide, "She has the voice of the people," a bitter speech, for Sophie hated her. She could not have said it of Mrs. Story. It is true that the audience applauded loudly, but the voice of the singer is free from the taint that gave the double meaning to the jest.

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's direction, played exceedingly well. The charming piece by Saint-Saëns was given with unusual delicacy; Hercules was given with unusual delicacy; Hercules was allowed his gigantic say; Omphale nagged him and mocked him to her heart's desire. The symphony was read dramatically, and passion did not rise superior to precision. The orchestra and the leader may well be congratulated on the work of the evening.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony Concert.

In these days, when the music of the future seems to be the ultimate aim of every young composer, and when one often hears the assertion that the new school has superseded the old, or will do so shortly, it is good to see that the classical models of musical form can be effectively used in the expression of modern musical ideas. The Strauss symphony showed that the thematic treatment and orchestration of the present day need not be hampered in any degree by the following out of classical traditions.

The symphony as a whole was very enjoyable, in spite of the length of the work. Its themes were all attractive and interesting, the novel character of the scherzo being especially noteworthy. As might be expected, horns and woodwind are frequently called upon to furnish the romantic coloring that is so much used in modern works. It is needless to say that these instruments were played in a thoroughly commendable manner, with the slight exception of a somewhat poor ensemble in the last few measures of the andante.

The first movement was given with clearness and brilliancy that could not fail to arouse admiration, the coda being given with especial animation. The second and third movements were given appropriate readings, but the finale was hardly agitated enough for the molto appassionato that the composer demanded.

Mme. Eames then appeared, and her goings and comings were accompanied by enthusiastic applause. The wonderful richness of her voice was well shown in the mournful pathos of the aria from Le Cid, and she sang the number with a good deal of dramatic feeling. Her phrasing and expression were admirable, both in the Massenet selection and in the aria from Gluck's Armide, which came later in the concert.

The performance of Le Rouet d'Omphale was creditable as to delicacy, but it might have been given with more swing. The programme-music character of the work demands vividness and animation; the figures of the story stand forth in life-like manner, so there must be life in the rendering of the piece. This fervor is what has been customary in such pieces at the concerts of the past few years.

The Academic Overture of Brahms, given with appropriate heartiness and force, ended the concert. It is a fact worthy of notice that with one exception the works were all by living composers. The programme was well calculated to show the different phases of the modern school. The Strauss symphony, besides being of great value intrinsically, is noteworthy in that it shows how modern material can be effectively used in the traditional manner; Massenet's symphonic poem is worthy exponent of the large school of programme music; while the Academic Overture proves that the folk-song can still be worked up by master minds to form great and noble productions.

ARTHUR ELSON.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

For the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, in Music Hall, the selections were: Symphony, F minor, op. 12, Richard Strauss; "Pleurez mes yeux," from "Le Cid," Massenet; "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Saint-Saëns; "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide," Gluck; and Academy Festival Overture, Brahms. The soloist was Mme. Emma Eames. The hall was packed, notwithstanding the unfavorable state of the weather. The Strauss symphony was heard here for the first time at this concert. It is a remarkable work for a young man not yet thirty years old. Its character is purely modern, and yet it is always interesting, despite an occasional tendency in the composer to prolixity. Its themes are very brief, but are strikingly melodious, and in their treatment the charm of tunefulness is never forgotten for any length of time, for even at his most recalcitrant moments the composer recalls that he is not oblivious to the effect of grace and soulfulness. The work, as a whole, is original without having recourse to the current method of reaching that end through the vague and the extravagant. Very often the work suggests Mendelssohn, and sometimes Schumann, subjected to a process of extreme modernizing. The composer has a complete mastery over all the resources of modern orchestration, and his score is affluent in the richest and most impressive orchestral coloring. The opening movement is pervaded by a noble melancholy and holds the attention and the interest from beginning to end. The Scherzo is brilliantly new, and its orchestration is surprising in its intricacy, its piquancy and its effectiveness, while its clearness is delightful. The andante is dignified, but is perhaps something more labored in effect than are the other movements, and is prolonged beyond the capacity of its themes, to interest. It is immensely difficult, but was splendidly played. The finale is fiery and impassioned, and is worked out with great vigor and effect. Taken altogether, the symphony impressed us as among the very best that we have heard from the young composers of the new school. It was finely read and performed, and its interpretation afforded the most satisfying evidence that Mr. Paur has as yet given of his skill as a conductor, and of his command over his orchestra. The Saint-Saëns symphonic poem was exquisitely performed. It was possibly taken at too slow a tempo to bring out its characteristic swing, but the grace and the refinement of the reading and the warmth and beauty of its coloring were fairly fascinating. Mr. Paur continues to grow steadily in estimation, and it now seems beyond all question that he is a conductor who will wear well, and who is an acquisition of great value. Mme. Eames, who was welcomed heartily, sang the Massenet air very beautifully. Her lovely voice, her perfect tunefulness, the finish of her style, and her strong and chaste dramatic feeling made it very satisfying to listen to her. Her enunciation was clear, and the effort stamped her as a finished artist in music of this school. She fairly earned and deserved the applause and the four recalls that rewarded her. Vocally, her rendering of the Gluck air was faultless, but it was not a happy selection for her, as it requires a singer with a larger and more classic style than she possesses, to do it justice. It is a question, too, if the air is worth the singing. It is hopelessly antiquated, and it is not an example of the composer at his best. The principal fault in the interpretation was the discrepancy between the emphasis the artist gave the music at the expense of the sentiment of the words. She was warmly applauded and recalled after this effort. We must again pay tribute to the perfect and sympathetic manner in which Mr. Paur accompanies singers. The programme for the next concert, which will take place a week from next Saturday night, is, the "Jupiter" Symphony, Mozart; double concerto for violin and cello, Brahms, and Symphony in D, Haydn.

Emma Eames Soloist at the Fourth Symphony—Patti Soon to Sing in Boston.

Emma Eames was the soloist at the fourth symphony concert, and in consequence Music Hall was uncomfortably crowded at both the Friday afternoon rehearsal and at last night's concert. Miss Eames is a great Boston favorite, alike in social and artistic circles, and the reception accorded her was demonstratively cordial. She sang three numbers, the recitative "De Cet Affreux Combat," and the aria "Pleurez! Pleurez mes Yeux!" from Massenet's opera "Le Cid," and the aria "Ah! Si la Liberté," from Gluck's opera "Armide."

In all of these selections, Miss Eames' rich and powerful voice was heard to excellent advantage, but it is probable that many in the audience would have been pleased to hear her sing something lighter. There is really no reason why a vocal soloist at the symphony concerts should confine herself to the severer class of music.

Miss Eames' voice is of wonderful purity and surpassing strength. It is smooth and clear throughout its extended range. Her execution is admirable, showing the best of schooling and the most artistic development of the rare gift bestowed upon her by nature. Miss Eames sang the recitative with a distinctness and expression that was thoroughly commendable. The arias were both sung with exquisite taste and expression, as well as strong dramatic effect.

A notable feature of the orchestra's offerings was the first performance here of Richard Strauss' symphony in F minor, op. 12. This is a very interesting work and contains some of the best and most original efforts of its talented composer. There are four movements and they are treated in a distinctly modern style. The orchestration is very elaborate and some strikingly unique effects are gained.

In the first movement heavy demands are made. A splendid interpretation was given by Mr. Paur.

Saint-Saëns' exquisite symphonic poem, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," was the especial treat of the orchestral selections. The dainty and graceful melodies were interpreted with delightful effect and expression. No work of this class has ever received more artistic performance from the symphony orchestra. Brahms' academic festival overture, splendidly played, was the final number of the very brilliant program.

There will be no concert this week. On Nov. 17 and 18 the program will be: Symphony in C major (Jupiter), Mozart; double concerto for violin and violoncello, Brahms; symphony in D major, Haydn; soloists, Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

MUSIC.

The Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony in F minor, op. 12.....Richard Strauss
Recitative and aria, "Pleurez! pleurez mes yeux!"
from "Le Cid".....Massenet
Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale".....Saint-Saëns
Aria, "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide".....Gluck
Akademische Fest-Ouverture.....Brahms

Oh, Richard Strauss, son of the Munich horn-player, what do you mean by this symphony in which you speak for an hour?

Or one might put to you the question of Fontenelle to the sonata.

Had you really so much to say that you could not have expressed yourself in a symphonic poem of from 20 minutes to half an hour?

Your symphony is full of surprising things; there are oratorical graces and flourishes; there is the pessimism seen in your "Don Juan"; there is the virility of stormy youth;—but tell us now, in strict confidence, did you write the music because you could not keep it within you, or did you not often cudgel your brains for a fresh thought, while you padded cleverly here and there?

You write a scherzo characterized by ingenious instrumentation and abounding in sharp contrasts; you write an andante that contains beautiful music; and then you write a finale, where by the side of grand passages is melodramatic music, "sneak music," music that might fit the galloping hoois in "Held by the Enemy."

Your symphony is full of suggestion. To the dreamer it is a delight. But the stern pedagogue might argue with reason, that one of the better waltzes of Johann Strauss would be of greater benefit to the student.

There are forms of music that were once deemed inevitable by all; that are now approved by many; but will another generation of musicians work in these forms? Will the oratorio and the symphony incite the enthusiasm of the coming composers? You are a hyper-modern; you have already tried the symphonic poem; you have a gift of awaking thought in the hearer; but in this symphony you arrest the attention rather by the expression of your thought than by the thought itself.

You are a symbolist in music. Passages in this symphony might illustrate Verlaine, and Ghal, and Gustave Kahn. There are vague ideas, as in the first movement, and I am not prepared to deny that vague ideas full of suggestion are superior to clear ideas of triteness.

Your symphony is so long, so long. Your processions of knights, spectres, strange inhabitants of strange lands, women who would fain join them, but follow far behind, are never ending.

But let us have the symphony again, for you provoke curiosity, and in another mood the hearer might substitute large admiration for moderate rapture.

It was a pleasure to hear Mrs. Eames-Story. It was a pleasure to hear a woman who does not suffer from a severe attack of the German vocal maul; who does not court popular applause by pyrotechnical display; who is modest and dignified on the stage, free from grimaces, heedless of familiar faces while she sings. Mrs. Story sang the air from "Le Cid" in a sympathetic manner, without any affectation, without a trick. Her delivery was admirable throughout. The simplicity of her treatment of the air from "Armide" was equally worthy of praise. Sophie Arnould said of Rosalie LeVasseur, who created the part of Armide, "She has the voice of the people;" a bitter speech, for Sophie hated her. She could not have said it of Mrs. Story. It is true that the audience applauded loudly, but the voice of the singer is free from the taint that gave the double meaning to the jest.

The orchestra, under Mr. Paur's direction, played exceedingly well. The charming piece by Saint-Saëns was given with unusual delicacy; Hercules was allowed his gigantic say; Omphale nagged him and mocked him to her heart's desire. The symphony was read dramatically, and passion did not rise superior to precision. The orchestra and the leader may well be congratulated on the work of the evening.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony Concert.

In these days, when the music of the future seems to be the ultimate aim of every young composer, and when one often hears the assertion that the new school has superseded the old, or will do so shortly, it is good to see that the classical models of musical form can be effectively used in the expression of modern musical ideas. The Strauss symphony showed that the thematic treatment and orchestration of the present day need not be hampered in any degree by the following out of classical traditions.

The symphony as a whole was very enjoyable, in spite of the length of the work. Its themes were all attractive and interesting, the novel character of the scherzo being especially noteworthy. As might be expected, horns and woodwind are frequently called upon to furnish the romantic coloring that is so much used in modern works. It is needless to say that these instruments were played in a thoroughly commendable manner, with the slight exception of a somewhat poor ensemble in the last few measures of the andante.

The first movement was given with clearness and brilliancy that could not fail to arouse admiration, the coda being given with especial animation. The second and third movements were given appropriate readings, but the finale was hardly agitated enough for the molto appassionato that the composer demanded.

Mme. Eames then appeared, and her goings and comings were accompanied by enthusiastic applause. The wonderful richness of her voice was well shown in the mournful pathos of the aria from "Le Cid," and she sang the number with a good deal of dramatic feeling. Her phrasing and expression were admirable, both in the Massenet selection and in the aria from Gluck's "Armide," which came later in the concert.

The performance of "Le Rouet d'Omphale" was creditable as to delicacy, but it might have been given with more swing. The programme-music character of the work demands vividness and animation; the figures of the story stand forth in life-like manner, so there must be life in the rendering of the piece. This fervor is what has been customary in such pieces at the concerts of the past few years.

The Academic Overture of Brahms, given with appropriate heartiness and force, ended the concert. It is a fact worthy of notice that with one exception the works were all by living composers. The programme was well calculated to show the different phases of the modern school. The Strauss symphony, besides being of great value intrinsically, is noteworthy in that it shows how modern material can be effectively used in the traditional manner; Massenet's symphonic poem is worthy exponent of the large school of programme music; while the Academic Overture proves that the folk-song can still be worked up by master minds to form great and noble productions.

ARTHUR ELSON.

Of course all the world was at the Symphony rehearsal on Friday afternoon and at the concert Saturday evening, not only to hear the fine program offered them by Mr. Paur (whose lack of poetic personality is fast being forgotten by even the matinee girls in his ability as a musician and conductor), but to see and hear Emma Eames. And she was well worth seeing and hearing. Her selections were rendered with a musicianly and artistic appreciation simply surprising in so young a singer. Personally she was a picture in her beautiful gowns on both occasions. The evil fairy we heard of in our childhood as presiding at births to keep one from being too liberally gifted, was absent at hers, I am sure.

Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert in the series was given in Sander's theatre, on Thursday evening, with this programme—Strauss, Symphony in F minor; Op. 12 Brahms, Variations on a Theme by Haydn; Beethoven, Overture, "Lenore," No. 3. The burden of the evening's entertainment fell on the orchestra, as there was no extraneous aid in the way of a soloist. This innovation might be welcome occasionally, but requires a more highly seasoned programme than the one given above. The symphony by Richard Strauss, written thirteen years ago, when the composer was only sixteen, bears undoubtedly the stamp of youthful genius, with many of its veritable shortcomings. It was played in Boston some weeks ago when it made a good impression, which was not heightened by the repetition in Cambridge. We doubt if it can ever produce the effect of a great work although to us it is far beyond any of Strauss' later efforts. The principal theme on the first movement will suggest Mendelssohn, while the Andante is at times a very earnest reminder of Schumann. This is by no means derogatory, however, as the plagiarisms of many of the modern composers are more interesting than their original ideas. The Scherzo is pleasing and melodious, but the Finale is by far the strongest movement of the work. It is thought out on a much larger scale, and although the thunder of the drum is at times sensational, the themes are so musical and inspiring and developed with such convincing force and vigor that the hearers cannot fail to have a profound belief in the enthusiasm of the young composer. The Variations by Brahms upon a theme by Haydn (Op. 56) for wind instruments, are among the most celebrated of Brahms' achievements in the manner of variations. His mathematical bent, or perhaps as one writer has said, his "brooding earnestness and abstraction," must have chosen this outlet at the very first of his career, for at the age of fourteen, on his first public appearance as a pianist, he played some variations on a folk-song of his own composing, perhaps the same theme which afterwards so ingeniously appears in the Academic Overture. The variations on Haydn's theme are nine in number, each delightfully distinct and individualized, the beautiful orchestral coloring never completely obscuring the principal theme. The Finale especially is superb, with its grand phrase for 'celli and basses taken up by the other instruments, and afterwards reaching a glorious climax in the return of the theme, with the addition of piccolo and triangle. The great Beethoven Overture to "Lenore" No. 3, is to us, one of Mr. Paur's most magnetic performances. In spite of his fluctuations of tempo, he grasps the great central idea with such sureness and fire, and the dynamic shading had so much more variety than in the previous numbers, that the effect was like a ray of purest sunlight. The audience, as usual, was large and enthusiastic. The next concert will be on Thursday evening, January 4.

C. R.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in C major, "Jupiter."
BRAHMS.	DOUBLE CONCERTO for VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO
HAYDN.	SYMPHONY in D major.

Soloists:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

104

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.

SYMPHONY in C major, "Jupiter."

- I. Allegro vivace.
 - II. Andante cantabile.
 - III. Menuetto: Allegretto.—Trio.
 - IV. Finale: Allegro molto.
- (First time in Boston.)

BRAHMS.

CONCERTO for VIOLIN and VIOLONCELLO, in A minor, opus 102.

- I. Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Vivace non troppo.

GLUCK.

OVERTURE to "Iphigénie en Aulide," in C major.
(In Richard Wagner's arrangement.)

Soloists

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

105

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT. adv.

The printed programme was rather misleading at the concert of Saturday, a most unusual matter, for not only were the numbers given in reversed order (without any notice), but the time-honored Jupiter symphony was announced as being performed for the "first time in Boston," and a symphony by Schumann in the very unusual orchestral key of B was announced for the next concert. The last error is one that calls attention to the rather absurd German nomenclature of two notes in the scale. To call B flat "B," and to give B the name of "H" as is done in Germany, is simply perpetuating a clerical error made in the 11th century; there is no valid reason why Germany should deviate from the nomenclature of England or America as regards B natural, and B flat might be called "Bes," according to the rest of the German nomenclature. That concert may be called exceptional where the errors are confined to the printing, and in this case even these were so self-evident and unimportant, that it is only the rarity of such slips that leads the reviewer to chronicle them.

The overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia In Aulis" in the Wagnerian arrangement was finely performed. The touches of the modern master are quite in line with the thought of the father of dramatic music, and in such a score as this Wagner shows that he had a keen sense of fitness. The superficial observer imagines that Wagner revelled in dissonances, was not happy unless he had a ponderous orchestra, and was forever chromatic in style; if such a person will study the fidelity of the additions in this overture, or the diatonic church mode used in the Theme of Faith in "Parsifal" he will see that the composer knew when to use complexity, and when simplicity.

The Brahms concerto for violin and violoncello received its first performance in Boston at this concert. It is a difficult task to do full justice to two different instruments in a single work of this kind. Beethoven's triple concerto, in which he used the above instruments with the addition of piano, is the weakest of his concertos, and the reviewer must confess that the new work, at a first hearing, did not seem to rival the second piano concerto of Brahms. Yet in one point Brahms is the greatest, perhaps the only, follower of Beethoven in this field; one never thinks of his concertos as mere solos with orchestral accompaniment. The care with which the orchestral touches were managed in this work was evident, and they so blended with the solo themes that it was impossible to think of the composition save as an orchestral work with solo threads interwoven through the fabric. It shows a certain degree of self-abnegation to play such a work, for the soloists must needs disappear in the ensemble. It is pleasant to record that Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder played with the high musicianship that regards the composer's intention above all personal display, and it was gratifying to see that they nevertheless received abundant recognition at its close.

The first movement showed Brahms as the intellectual giant in the domain of development; in this he treads close upon the heels of Beethoven himself, yet there is this great distinction between the two masters—Beethoven was deeply emotional even in the midst of his intellectuality, while Brahms is phlegmatic. Every touch seems carefully calculated, the composer never seems to yield himself wholly up to the inspiration of his thought, he is playing a game of musical chess with the public. After all, the composer's life must in some degree influence his music; a pleasant burgher existence in Vienna is not the highway to intensity; as well expect glorious marine pictures from a painter who has never seen the ocean, as portrayals of emotion from the composer whose life has been entirely free from rude shocks of adversity or from the torments of passion. Brahms' one great sorrow, the loss of his mother, crystallized into his greatest work, the German requiem, and then the heart went into the background and the brain resumed its absolute supremacy. Therefore, while paying due tribute to the development, the symmetry, the unity, and the logic of the great first movement of this composition, the reviewer must add that he was not moved or excited any more than he would have been by some intricate demonstration of mathematics. Brahms' intellectuality overbalances what emotional power he possesses.

There were many strong touches of tone-color in the second movement, chiefly in the lower register of the strings, and there was a quaintness in some of the themes that sustained the interest. The finale offered far more of contrast than any other part of the work. There was a Hungarian flavor here, and a certain dash that had its charm. Altogether, one is disposed to consider this the most successful, the most inspired, portion of the work, although the first movement is much more elaborate, ambitious and extended.

As if the programme itself had been a rondo, it returned at its end to the style of its beginning. The modern concerto was followed by another specimen of the older style of dramatic treatment, but finer than that of Gluck, in the shape of the "Jupiter" symphony by Mozart. The conductor occasionally made this a symphony in which Jupiter Tonans was the chief character, and this thundering Jove launched some thunderbolts that were heavier than Mozart had thought of. There was an evident desire that not a scrap of the work should go to waste, and the contrasts were somewhat too palpably forced, but the delicious andante of the second movement was charmingly given by the muted strings, and the contrast with the intricate concerto, made it seem like delicious rest after a severe task. It may be that some day our music will turn back to such a style as this; it is possible that the composer of the future may combine the melodic grace of a Mozart with the tone-coloring of a Wagner.

The fugal passages of the finale were most clearly read. Mozart was probably the only composer who could construct a fugue, or a fugato, so that it should win the heart of the general public, innocent of all knowledge of the intricacies of counterpoint. Such a finale as this, or such a fugato as the chief theme of the "Magic Flute" overture, prove that the severely classical and the tunefully popular can be made to shake hands and fraternize.

Next Saturday the musical wayfarer will be guided along more modern paths, and the road will lead from Schumann to Liszt.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last evening's Symphony concert Director Emil Paur brought forward Gluck, Brahms and Mozart as the composers of the occasion, the works chosen being Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" in C major, Brahms' concerto for violin and violoncello in A minor, op. 102, and Mozart's symphony in C major ("Jupiter").

The interest of the evening centred in the appearance of Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder as the solo players in the Brahms concerto, and, although to those who question the policy of admitting the absolute value of everything written by Mr. Brahms the wisdom of the expenditure of time and trouble in the performance of this work was open to question, it was evident that the superior analytical powers of the audience, as a whole, discovered rare beauties in the construction of the work and enjoyed its performance immensely. Both the players of the solo parts commanded the applause which rewarded their efforts by their admirable work.

The Mozart symphony was heard with immense gratification after the concerto, as the beauty of its flowing melodies made its hearing a continued source of pleasure. Mr. Paur gave the work a magnificent interpretation, and brought out the grand features of the final movement with masterly effect.

The arrangement of the Gluck overture used was that by Richard Wagner, and the reading of this classical overture displayed the sterling worth of Mr. Paur's abilities as a conductor to the greatest advantage.

Mrs. Emil Paur makes her American debut as a solo pianist at the concert next Saturday evening when the programme will consist of Schumann's symphony in B major, No. 1; the Schubert-Liszt "Wanderer" fantasy for piano and orchestra; Berlioz's three movements from his symphony "Romeo and Juliet," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

Symphony Concert. Globe

Mr Franz Kneisel and Mr Alwin Schroeder were the soloists at the fifth symphony rehearsal and concert, at which conductor Paur offered the following program: Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Brahms' A minor concerto for violin and cello, and Gluck's overture to Iphigenia. The grand symphony was grandly played, the rich orchestral ornamentation and elaborate development of themes being clearly and brilliantly set forth. The famous finale, so characteristic of the wonderful tone master, was the feature of fine interpretation of Mozart's work. Gluck's overture, which was finished for concert performances by Wagner, was daintily played, and but little fault could be found with the tone of the string contingent, or the excellent work of the wood, wind and brasses.

The Brahms concert introduced Mr Kneisel, violin, and Mr Schroeder, cellist. These artists charmed their audience by an almost faultless execution of their number. Their intonations were pure and sympathetic, and they gave pleasing evidence of the result of long artistic association by the beautiful ensemble displayed throughout the whole work. The solo instruments were in perfect sympathy, and the two soloists were recalled at the close of their performance, and Mr. Paur appeared as well pleased with his fellow artists as were the auditors. At this week's concert Mrs Emil Paur will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Schumann, symphony in B major, No. 1; Schubert-Liszt, "Wanderer," fantasy for piano and orchestra; Berlioz, three movements from symphony "Romeo and Juliet;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

MR. PAUR'S FIRST TOUR.

Mr. Emil Paur has made his first tour in America during the last week, having conducted the first of the season's series of concerts announced by the Boston orchestra in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington.

Not a little interest was felt in the reception which the Boston orchestra should meet with in the cities named with its new conductor, for it is one thing to meet the demands of an audience inclined to favor a home undertaking, and others having no interest beyond the actual artistic results of a performance.

Mr. Paur's merits as a conductor having been frankly and freely admitted by the Boston public, and it is now a pleasure to be able to add that the cities visited during the tour have confirmed the verdict of the home audiences and shown a practical appreciation of the Boston orchestra under its new conductor by buying all the tickets offered for sale in the several cities.

The concert given on Monday evening in Washington called out an audience limited in numbers only by the size of the hall. The matinee on Tuesday at Baltimore was more largely attended than any before given in that city, and on Wednesday evening the audience at Carnegie Hall, New York, filled that great house to overflowing, every one of the 64 private boxes being fully occupied. The records of former seasons in Philadelphia were more than maintained in the concert given at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, as the audience numbered over 3500, and hundreds of persons had to receive their money back because they could not gain admittance. The concerts given in Brooklyn Friday afternoon and last evening were attended by equally gratifying results, as both audiences showed a gain over any in that city during last season.

Mr. Paur's second thoughts about his fifth programme were better than his first ones. Accordingly the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony was put at the foot of the bill at last night's Symphony, the double concerto of Brahms kept its central place, the Haydn symphony was withdrawn, and the concert began with Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture.

Considering his programme per se, there is almost nothing to be said. The overture and the symphony are such ancient acquaintances that they can come for the welcome given to strangers before only the newest subscribers to Boston concerts and may be set down as among the "educational" features of the season. The concerto is unfamiliar, being among its author's comparatively recent compositions, of course, but Boston has heard enough from and about Brahms during the past few years to be able to cope in some degree of ease with his peculiar characteristics as therein shown—his sufficiency of distinct thematic material, his disposition toward shifting rhythms and accents, his learned and often obtuse thematic development and his sturdy and occasionally passionate insistence upon his ideas and their elaboration. The presentation of two solo instruments, although no modern novelty, is not unusual, and on the one hand gives a composer greater scope in his writing, while on the other it offers at once to the musician more food for thought and to laymen more occupation and entertainment. Mr. Paur is just the director for Brahms, because he has at once the exactitude of perception and the fixed delivery which insure the clear conveyance of form and figure and the energy and heat requisite for the more emphatic assertiveness of the composer.

That Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder read the violin and cello parts to perfection, hardly needs to be said. Each is a principal artist in his line, unling to complete virtuosity, the scholar's knowledge and the artist's style.

The concerto pleases as a whole, although there are some strange jars between the parts at times—dissonances running mad, as one might say—and some short passages which cannot real please any but those who admire Brahms through thick and thin. But the slow movement is redundant in beauty and sweetness.

The overture was fairly and squarely read and with no little play of feeling, and the symphony was respectfully and consistently treated, barring, in the first movement, a few lingering delays and over-urgent accents upon an odd bar here and there.

Next week the Symphony audience will have the pleasure, already provided for at the Kneisel and Apolo concerts, of hearing Mr. Paur, who will play (with orchestra) Liszt's "Wanderer" Fantasy. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's first symphony, three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Liszt's poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

Comins

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was: Symphony, C, ("Jupiter"), Mozart; Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, A-minor, Brahms; Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," (Wagner's arrangement), Gluck. The overture was elaborately read, and with such a variety of emphasis and contrast in color effect, that it is doubtful if Gluck would have recognized his own work, could he have heard it. The performance was thoroughly impressive, but the broad dignity and the frank simplicity of the overture melted away under the excess of effects that were crowded into it. Its almost cold classicism was changed to a warm, modern romanticism, and it was subjected generally to a treatment of which Gluck could not have even dreamed. This bringing down to date the works of the older masters is to reprehended on the ground that it utterly misrepresents them. The Mozart Symphony was beautifully played, and on the whole, with admirable judgment in regard to the pace of the different movements. It is true that Mr. Paur, in his earnest desire to bring out all that there is in the work, somewhat overloaded it with contrasts in effect. As in the overture too much modern color was forced into the Symphony, and the natural flow of the music was checked by the constantly recurring alternations in dynamic effects that were injected into it, every now and then, at important moments; the continuity was interrupted and an impression of disjointedness resulted. It was evidently the intention of Mr. Paur to give a warm and fluent interpretation of the work, but the deliberate elaboration produced quite a contrary effect, and for once Mozart sounded cold;—very finished, very smooth and very proper, but cold, nevertheless. In fact, it was more of a formal analysis, in which every point was brought out with prominence in order to show that it was there, than a reading swayed by the obvious spirit of the music. It was a dissection of the work, made by one who had informed himself of the exact place of every nerve, muscle and vital organ, the veins filled with red wax to enable one to distinguish their forms and their course. This is scarcely the manner in which Mozart is to be shown. One at last becomes ear-weary of the affluence of delicate pianissimo effects, and longs for the music to be permitted to flow readily and simply. The playing was very beautiful throughout, and the always astonishing fugue in the finale came out with exceptional clearness and brilliancy. The novelty of the programme was the Brahms concerto. This is undoubtedly a fine composition, but, as it seemed to us, there is too much of it, and there were moments when we could have wished that the solo instruments had less of nothing in particular to do except setting forth difficult passages of no especial moment. The first and the second movements are the best; but, even here, it

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

At last evening's Symphony concert Director Emil Paur brought forward Gluck, Brahms and Mozart as the composers of the occasion, the works chosen being Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" in C major, Brahms' concerto for violin and violoncello in A minor, op. 102, and Mozart's symphony in C major ("Jupiter").

The interest of the evening centred in the appearance of Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder as the solo players in the Brahms concerto, and, although to those who question the policy of admitting the absolute value of everything written by Mr. Brahms the wisdom of the expenditure of time and trouble in the performance of this work was open to question, it was evident that the superior analytical powers of the audience, as a whole, discovered rare beauties in the construction of the work and enjoyed its performance immensely. Both the players of the solo parts commanded the applause which rewarded their efforts by their admirable work.

The Mozart symphony was heard with immense gratification after the concerto, as the beauty of its flowing melodies made its hearing a continued source of pleasure. Mr. Paur gave the work a magnificent interpretation, and brought out the grand features of the final movement with masterly effect.

The arrangement of the Gluck overture used was that by Richard Wagner, and the ringing of this classical overture displayed the sterling worth of Mr. Paur's abilities as a conductor to the greatest advantage.

Mrs. Emil Paur makes her American debut as a solo pianist at the concert next Saturday evening when the programme will consist of Schumann's symphony in B major, No. 1; the Schubert-Liszt "Wanderer" fantasy for piano and orchestra; Berlioz's, three movements from symphony "Romeo and Juliet," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

Symphony Concert. Globe

Mr Franz Kneisel and Mr Alwin Schroeder were the soloists at the fifth symphony rehearsal and concert, at which conductor Paur offered the following program; Mozart's "Jupiter" symphony, Brahms' A minor concerto for violin and cello, and Gluck's overture to Iphigenia. The grand symphony was grandly played, the rich orchestral ornamentation and elaborate development of themes being clearly and brilliantly set forth. The famous finale, so characteristic of the wonderful tone master, was the feature of fine interpretation of Mozart's work. Gluck's overture, which was finished for concert performances by Wagner, was daintily played, and but little fault could be found with the tone of the string contingent, or the excellent work of the wood, wind and brasses.

The Brahms concert introduced Mr Kneisel, violin, and Mr Schroeder, cellist. These artists charmed their audience by an almost faultless execution of their number. Their intonations were pure and sympathetic, and they gave pleasing evidence of the result of long artistic association by the beautiful ensemble displayed throughout the whole work. The solo instruments were in perfect sympathy, and the two soloists were recalled at the close of their performance, and Mr. Paur appeared as well pleased with his fellow artists as were the auditors.

At this week's concert Mrs Emil Paur will be the soloist. The program will be as follows: Schumann, symphony in B major, No. 1; Schubert-Liszt, "Wanderer," fantasy for piano and orchestra; Berlioz, three movements from symphony "Romeo and Juliet;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

MR. PAUR'S FIRST TOUR.

Mr. Emil Paur has made his first tour in America during the last week, having conducted the first of the season's series of concerts announced by the Boston orchestra in the cities of New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington. Not a little interest was felt in the reception which the Boston orchestra should meet with in the cities named with its new conductor, for it is one thing to meet the demands of an audience inclined to favor a home undertaking, and others having no interest beyond the actual artistic results of a performance.

Mr. Paur's merits as a conductor having been frankly and freely admitted by the Boston public, and it is now a pleasure to be able to add that the cities visited during the tour have confirmed the verdict of the home audiences and shown a practical appreciation of the Boston orchestra under its new conductor by buying all the tickets offered for sale in the several cities.

The concert given on Monday evening in Washington called out an audience limited in numbers only by the size of the hall. The matinee on Tuesday at Baltimore was more largely attended than any before given in that city, and on Wednesday evening the audience at Carnegie Hall, New York, filled that great house to overflowing, every one of the 64 private boxes being fully occupied. The records of former seasons in Philadelphia were more than maintained in the concert given at the Academy of Music on Thursday evening, as the audience numbered over 3500, and hundreds of persons had to receive their money back because they could not gain admittance. The concerts given in Brooklyn Friday afternoon and last evening were attended by equally gratifying results, as both audiences showed a gain over any in that city during last season.

Mr. Paur's second thoughts about his fifth programme were better than his first ones. Accordingly the Mozart "Jupiter" symphony was put at the foot of the bill at last night's Symphony, the double concerto of Brahms kept its central place, the Haydn symphony was withdrawn, and the concert began with Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis" overture.

Considering his programme per se, there is almost nothing to be said. The overture and the symphony are such ancient acquaintances that they can come for the welcome given to strangers before only the newest subscribers to Boston concerts and may be set down as among the "educational" features of the season. The concerto is unfamiliar, being among its author's comparatively recent compositions, of course, but Boston has heard enough from and about Brahms during the past few years to be able to cope in some degree of ease with his peculiar characteristics as therein shown—his sufficiency of distinct thematic material, his disposition toward shifting rhythms and accents, his learned and often obtuse thematic development and his sturdy and occasionally passionate insistence upon his ideas and their elaboration. The presentation of two solo instruments, although no modern novelty, is not unusual, and on the one hand gives a composer greater scope in his writing, while on the other it offers at once to the musician more food for thought and to laymen more occupation and entertainment. Mr. Paur is just the director for Brahms, because he has at once the exactitude of perception and the fixed delivery which insure the clear conveyance of form and figure and the energy and heat requisite for the more emphatic assertiveness of the composer.

That Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder read the violin and cello parts to perfection, hardly needs to be said. Each is a principal artist in his line, unliking to complete virtuosity, the scholar's knowledge and the artist's style.

The concerto pleases as a whole, although there are some strange jars between the parts at times—dissonances running mad, as one might say—and some short passages which cannot real please any but those who admire Brahms through thick and thin. But the slow movement is redundant in beauty and sweetness.

The overture was fairly and squarely read and with no little play of feeling, and the symphony was respectfully and consistently treated, barring, in the first movement, a few lingering delays and over-urgent accents upon an odd bar here and there.

Next week the Symphony audience will have the pleasure, already provided for at the Kneisel and Apolo concerts, of hearing Mr. Paur, who will play (with orchestra) Liszt's "Wanderer" Fantasy. The orchestral numbers will be Schumann's first symphony, three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and Liszt's poem, "Fest-Klaenge."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was: Symphony, C, ("Jupiter"), Mozart; Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, A-minor, Brahms; Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis," (Wagner's arrangement), Gluck. The overture was elaborately read, and with such a variety of emphasis and contrast in color effect, that it is doubtful if Gluck would have recognized his own work, could he have heard it. The performance was thoroughly impressive, but the broad dignity and the frank simplicity of the overture melted away under the excess of effects that were crowded into it. Its almost cold classicity was changed to a warm, modern romanticism, and it was subjected generally to a treatment of which Gluck could not have even dreamed. This bringing down to date the works of the older masters is to reprehended on the ground that it utterly misrepresents them. The Mozart Symphony was beautifully played, and on the whole, with admirable judgment in regard to the pace of the different movements. It is true that Mr. Paur, in his earnest desire to bring out all that there is in the work, somewhat overloaded it with contrasts in effect. As in the overture too much modern color was forced into the Symphony, and the natural flow of the music was checked by the constantly recurring alternations in dynamic effects that were injected into it, every now and then, at important moments; the continuity was interrupted and an impression of disjointedness resulted. It was evidently the intention of Mr. Paur to give a warm and fluent interpretation of the work, but the deliberate elaboration produced quite a contrary effect, and for once Mozart sounded cold;—very finished, very smooth and very proper, but cold, nevertheless. In fact, it was more of a formal analysis, in which every point was brought out with prominence in order to show that it was there, than a reading swayed by the obvious spirit of the music. It was a dissection of the work, made by one who had informed himself of the exact place of every nerve, muscle and vital organ, the veins filled with red wax to enable one to distinguish their forms and their course. This is scarcely the manner in which Mozart is to be shown. One at last becomes ear-weary of the affluence of delicate pianissimo effects, and longs for the music to be permitted to flow readily and simply. The playing was very beautiful throughout, and the always astonishing fugue in the finale came out with exceptional clearness and brilliancy. The novelty of the programme was the Brahms concerto. This is undoubtedly a fine composition, but, as it seemed to us, there is too much of it, and there were moments when we could have wished that the solo instruments had less of nothing in particular to do except setting forth difficult passages of no especial moment. The first and the second movements are the best; but, even here, it struck us that the orchestral moments, when the soloists are at rest, are the strongest and most interesting portions of the concerto. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder were the soloists, and they acquitted themselves of their difficult tasks with their familiar skill in regard to perfection of technique and solidity of style. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 1, Schumann; "Wanderer" Fantasy for piano and orchestra, Schubert-Liszt; three movements from the symphony "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; Symphonic Poem, "Festklänge," Liszt. Mrs. Emil Paur is to be the soloist.

IN THE MUSIC WORLD.

The Symphony Orchestra in New York—Other Matters of Interest.

The large Carnegie Music Hall in New York was filled to overflowing last Wednesday evening by an audience gathered to welcome Conductor Paur and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the occasion being the first of this year's series of concerts to be given by this organization in that city. Conductor Paur was warmly received and throughout the evening was enthusiastically applauded. The enthusiasm exhibited left no doubt respecting a very favorable opinion of Mr. Paur's merits on the part of the audience, both as regards his conducting and his interpretations, and its voice was unanimous in the opinion expressed.

The critics, however, did not seem to agree. It may be interesting for our readers to know what these gentlemen thought of our new conductor.

The writer in the New York Times speaks of Mr. Paur as a scholarly, sound, intelligent and energetic conductor, but to him it seems as if the gods had not made him poetical.

The Tribune finds Mr. Paur's conducting much better in the effect than in its appearance, and regards the playing of the first and second movements of the fifth symphony of Beethoven as tedious, but praises the playing of Dvorak's "Slavonic Rhapsody" No. 2, and the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture of Berlioz, describing it as a most brilliant rendering of these compositions.

The New York Sun comments upon Mr. Paur's attractive personality, his manly appearance, the charm of his lack of self-consciousness, and admires his frank and dignified manner. It says also that Mr. Paur proved himself to be a master in the art of leading an orchestra as well as an interpreter of music, from whose ipse dixit there can be no appeal.

The New York Herald does not like Mr. Paur's conducting. He is very jerky; there is a perceptible hesitation in his attack, and it is difficult to tell upon which beat the accent lay. Mr. Paur has not dramatic instinct; he is of a dreamy, poetic nature; he is desperately in earnest, but he makes one nervous by his unmeaningly emphatic gestures, and he lacks the ability to work up and effect a climax.

The New York Recorder says Mr. Paur looks as if he hailed from the Quaker city; he is very Teutonic; earnest, awkward, angular, sincere, dry, scholarly and absolutely devoid of magnetism; there also are about 5000 such conductors in this country and 50,000 in Europe. Sanity, sobriety and solemnity were the three grave qualities of the playing of the orchestra on this occasion. Mr. Paur's readings are more muscular than musical; he is virile, but lacks imagination; he is more pedantic than Gericke, but lacks that conductor's exquisite taste and finesse. Mr. Paur is a great director; he carries out the phrases for you with astonishing patience, but the bloom, the poetry, the profound meanings, where are they? His frigidity would chill Theodore Thomas, even when the latter is below zero.

Perhaps a little later on these gentlemen will be more agreed in their opinions. In the meantime we shall keep right on thinking here in Boston that we have got a conductor whose ability far excels Mr. Nikisch's as well as that of any conductor in New York, and as long as the concerts are crowded with eager listeners the management will be quite content with the prevailing conditions.

In the other cities visited the attendance was phenomenally large. In Baltimore the audience was the largest ever seen at the concerts of this organization. The concert in Washington saw an attendance that was limited only with the size of the hall. At the two concerts given in Brooklyn the attendance was the largest yet seen in that city, while in Philadelphia 300 people were crowded into the Academy of Music, and hundreds were turned away unable to gain admittance.

When we consider how hard the times are, this great success away from home is most gratifying, and the financial gain will naturally serve in lessening the great burden Mr. Higginson has to bear in pursuing his noble enterprise. W.D.

MUSIC.

The Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two composers of world-wide reputation died lately, Gounod and Tchaikowsky.

It is a matter of surprise and regret that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has not recognized this fact in any way whatsoever.

In certain towns of Europe, where music is regarded as an emotional art, it is the custom when a composer of great reputation dies to honor his memory, sometimes by exposing his bust or picture in concert hall or opera house, often by playing reverently one of his compositions.

But we are conservative in Boston, and music is regarded here chiefly as an intellectual pursuit, something that makes for educational righteousness. Besides, neither Gounod nor Tchaikowsky was a German.

Or Mr. Paur may say "Gounod was a maker of operas; he was not a writer for orchestra alone. How can we honor his memory in a symphony concert?"

You have heard of the town of Leipsic, Mr. Paur; you have heard of the Gewandhaus concerts, and you are aware of the character of the said concerts. You also know how conservative musically are the good and the bad people of Leipsic.

Now I read in the Signale, No. 56 of this year, that at the Gewandhaus concert, given Nov. 2, one number of the programme was dedicated to the memory of Gounod. A march, described as "Feierlicher Marsch," by Charles Gounod, was played in honor of him. This may or may not have been the "Marche Romaine;" the point is immaterial; the fact remains that the death of the Frenchman was noticed fitly in Leipsic, in the very temple devoted to the worship of "classical" composers.

And even Mr. Bernsdorf, who is generally ill at ease when he is obliged to hear modern music or write about it, paid the memory of Gounod a handsome tribute in his critique of the concert.

Gounod never visited this country, but Tchaikowsky was our guest. It is true that he conducted no one of his works in Boston. There was apparently no desire here to even see the illustrious composer. Yet, why should not his remarkable overture to "Hamlet" or to "Romeo and Juliet," or one of his symphonies be played in Music Hall to remind us of the world's loss?

As for that matter, it might not be uninteresting to hear the second symphony of Gounod or his nonetto for wind instruments.

Others thought of remembering, according to their capacity, the death of Gounod, even if you, Mr. Paur, did not, you who have the resources of the Symphony Orchestra behind you, you who have the opportunity of inviting singers to join you in your work.

Such a tribute to the memory of the composer of "Faust" did not escape the thought of Mr. William Heinrich, the Manager of the New England Conservatory, or certain Roman Catholic Churches in this town.

The programme of the Symphony concert of last evening was as follows:

Overture "Iphigénie en Aulide," Gluck; Double concerto for violin and cello, op. 102. Brahms; Symphony C major ("Jupiter") Mozart.

Brahms' "Double Concerto" was first played in public, October 18, 1887, by Joachim and Hausmann, if I am not mistaken. It was then played at Cologne. Its first performance in America was by Max Bendix and Victor Herbert, January 5, 1889, at a Thomas Symphony concert in New York.

The concerto is in many respects a disappointing work. First of all it seems labored. The themes are neither fresh nor interesting. The thematic development is often ingenious, at times unreasonably intricate, as though the composer was so interested in the solution of a puzzle that he forgot that he was a musician. If there are occasional passages that are suggestive and almost beautiful, there are other passages in the first and third movements that are disagreeable without justification, and almost hideous. The andante is more endurable, and portions of it are charming.

The concerto is singularly arranged. Let us waive the question whether Brahms's choice of solo instruments was fortunate. The question here is, What employment did he make of them? He, first of all, favored the cello. The violin part is extremely thankless, and it swarms with difficulties which seem needless and without any effect, even when they are conquered by such an admirable violinist as Mr. Kneisel. But neither the violin nor the cello is so used individually, nor are they so used together that the hearer is able to listen to one dominating voice or to two voices that compel attention. It is as though the orchestra had invited two guests to listen to the stranger's words of wit and wisdom; but afterward the members of the orchestra forgot good breeding and insisted on showing their guests how clever they themselves were and how much they knew.

The great fault, however, is that this concerto shows a poverty of imagination. There is technique galore; but there is little genuine music. Messrs. Kneisel and Schroeder performed their arduous task with skill and courage.

PHILIP HALE.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Gluck: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide," in C major (In Richard Wagner's arrangement.)

Brahms: Concerto for Violin and Violoncello, in A minor, Opus 102.

Mozart: Symphony in C major ("Jupiter"). Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist and Mr. Alwin Schroeder the cellist.

The overture to "Iphigénie" was beautifully played, and quite according to Wagner's ideas. One hardly knows what to think of Wagner's arguments regarding the proper tempo of this overture; they are extremely plausible, they are based on a genially artistic idea, and are backed up by far more credible documentary evidence than, for instance, his reasoning about the sudden piano in the coda of the "Freischütz" overture—felicitous though his suggestion in this latter case is. And yet one can not wholly escape the feeling that his arguments about the "Iphigénie" have a flaw in them somewhere. He throws great stress upon the fact that the overture is marked "andante" at the beginning, and that this indication of tempo is cancelled by no marking of "allegro" over the twentieth measure in the original Paris edition of the score; he furthermore refers to the fact that one of the themes of the overture reappears in the opera itself in a different notation. In the chorus of mutinous Greeks in the first act it is written in eighth-notes and marked allegro; in the overture it is written in sixteenth-notes, and Wagner argues that, by retaining the marking "andante" of the beginning, the same rate of speed would be attained in both cases; that is, allegro in eighth-notes equals andante in sixteenth-notes. His whole argument tends to combat the rapid tempo at which the overture (from the last up-beat of the nineteenth measure on) was traditionally played in Germany, and the "allegro" mark over the twentieth measure in many German scores, which last he considers an unwarrantable and gratuitous intercalation. On the other side may be advanced that Mozart's coda to the overture (for concert performance) evidently assumes an exceedingly rapid tempo as taken for granted; Wagner himself admits this tacitly, for he says "it would not bear listening to at all so soon as it was played in (what he considered) the right tempo of what preceded it in the composition." This is tantamount to saying that a slower tempo made nonsense of it at once. Now, it seems not a little curious that Mozart, a contemporary of Gluck's, a man of the highest genius and musical culture, and of very exceptionally keen insight into the works of other composers, should so totally have misapprehended the character of Gluck's overture as to mistake the tempo at which it should be played. Again, it may be urged that Wagner's tempo has all the characteristics of the modern, now fashionable, "slow allegro," something that belongs almost distinctively to our own day and reflects a characteristic phase of our modern musical feeling; it did not belong to Gluck's day at all. Had Gluck really meant the main body of his overture to go at this rate, it would have shown a spirit of "modernism" in him such as would throw his other musical innovations quite into the shade; a "slow allegro" in a composition by Gluck would have been quite as much of an anachronism as, say, the B-naturals in the violins (against the C-sharps in flute and bassoon) in the twelfth and thirteenth measures of the Allegro of Mozart's overture to "Don Giovanni," which are still retained in some editions, but which the best authorities agree were misprints, or slips of the pen, for B-flat. By this we by no means mean to say that Wagner's slower tempo in the overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide" is nor thoroughly welcome to modern ears; it certainly is delightful—quite as much so as his sudden piano in the "Freischütz" overture, and of decidedly deeper import—and we could not find it in our hearts to wish the composition played otherwise; only its authenticity does not seem to us quite conclusive. By no means the least remarkable feature in last Saturday's performance of the work was the exquisite way the first violins played that little turn and mordent in the second theme—playing the turn clearly and smoothly, and just hinting at the mordent—it was the acme of grace!

The royal "Jupiter" symphony was grandly played. Mr. Paur, to be sure, monkeyed a little with the tempo in parts of the first movement in a way with which we could not sympathize; but the great work was given with splendid force, brilliancy and all due delicacy, and made a stupendous impression. It was interesting to compare it in one way with the "Iphigénie" overture: both this and the Finale of the symphony show frequent reflections of Handel. But, with Gluck, you cannot help feeling when he suggests Handel that the Halle giant would have been stronger, more interesting and impressive, whereas, with Mozart, you feel that he is every inch up to the height of his great model. If we have a criticism to make on the performance, it is that the trumpets and drums seemed rather too subdued almost throughout; what Mendelssohn said of Handel: " * * * when he brings up his kettledrums and trumpets towards the end, and thumps and batters away to his heart's content, as if he meant to knock you down, no mortal can remain unmoved," seems to us to apply equally well to Mozart; trumpets were trumpets in his day, and he never heard of wadded drumsticks! The uncompromising crackle of the trumpets in Mozart's symphonies and overtures (not to mention Haydn and Beethoven) is one of the good traditions of the old Leipzig Gewandhaus.

The Brahms concerto brings us back once more to our old song. One cannot but think that Brahms must have written this work (and one or two others perhaps) mainly out of gratitude to certain virtuosi who were true to him through thick and thin in the days before he was crowned King of Music; all other explanations are unsatisfactory. Brahms can in no just sense be called a conservative; if he continues to write in the traditional musical forms, it is plainly because he finds them congenial, and not from any merely conservative predetermination. He treats these forms with a freedom that precludes all notion of merely academic reverence for them; in spirit he is a modern of the moderns. This being so, one can hardly conceive of his spontaneously choosing to write for a combination of instruments (solo violin and 'cello with orchestra) that stands in the strongest imaginable antagonism to the modern musical instinct; willingly to force himself to write passages to be faintly whispered by solo instruments, when it would take the largest orchestral utterance to show their full purport, is to do a thing which is inconceivable on purely musical grounds. And note also that modern orchestration, what might be called the modern orchestral touch, has become so habitual and inveterate with Brahms that he can hardly touch the mighty complex instrument without making it resound twice as sonorously as the older composers did; he can hardly write for a single flute and clarinet without making them sound stronger than Mozart or Beethoven would—all of which is to the detriment of his solo instruments. In this concerto one feels inevitably, as and still more than one did in his violin concerto, that he is really fighting with one hand tied behind him, is attempting a task not congenial to his genius, a difficult and well-nigh impossible tour de force. Save in one or two passages, the solo violin and 'cello seem very like those royal personages who raise their smallpipine voices in a weighty debate, and to whose fatuous utterances grave men must listen with every outward token of respect, because of the speaker's rank. Except that here the solo instruments really have something important to say, but say it so ill, so pallidly and impotently; they carry no conviction with them, and you heartily wish them in Jericho. How freely, brilliantly, and convincingly Brahms here speaks in his tutti! and how the constant necessity he is under of allowing his violin and 'cello to be heard lames his hand in the solo passages! One feels sure that, had he been left to himself and his orchestra, he would have made something quite different out of this work, with its glorious themes, so full of titanic energy, beauty and power. The conditions in which he has placed himself even go far to paralyze his usually so convincing power of musical development. The concerto stands as a work full of sublime and beautiful moments, full of flashes of commanding genius, rather than as a wholly great work, as one steady flame. Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder played wonderfully. They did what might be done with their respective parts; effective they could not be! Once more we repeat it: the modern violin, or 'cello, concerto, when written by a true modern master, is not and cannot be the throne from which the virtuoso rules over a willing public; it is rather the gallows on which he publicly hangs himself!

The next programme is: Schumann, symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 61; Schubert-Liszt, "Wanderer" fantasia in C major, for pianoforte and orchestra; Berlioz, three movements from the "Roméo et Juliette" symphony, opus 17; Liszt, symphonic poem, "Festklänge." Mrs. Emil Paur will be the pianist.

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY.

An Interesting Programme Artistically Given.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place at Music Hall, Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Overture—Iphigénie in Aulis. Gluck
Concerto for violin and cello, in A-minor, op. 102. Brahms.
Symphony, in C-major "Jupiter." Mozart.

Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder were the soloists. The Gluck overture, to which Richard Wagner has added an ending for concert purposes, was played in a careful, and, perhaps, a little over-elaborate manner, a characteristic of Mr. Paur's interpretations, his endeavor evidently being to bring out all that can be obtained from the music. This is a commendable effort, and when there appears a better gradation of dynamics, and a more continuous flow in displaying as well the breadth of outline of the composition, then we shall have a higher order of renderings.

The conscientious and musician-like qualities of Conductor Paur are to be praised, and the now more flexible and less emphatic manner of his conducting are features that look towards an improvement over his efforts on the occasion of his debut here.

The lovely Mozart symphony was read with great attention to the detail of the expressions, the rendering only wanting in a more marked definition of dynamics than was shown.

It is folly to elaborate or to attempt to romanticize the classics. To display the real value of these immortal compositions they need only to be played with precision, good intonation, discretion as regards overloud fortissimos, and an absolutely perfect gradation in the various degrees of power. The charming melodies, the melodious counterpoint, the simple but effective harmonies, the rational contrasts in tempi, and the degrees of power are the elements that characterize their beauty and effectiveness. Such characteristics render them independent of the necessities of the complicated strivings of modern works, which, lacking the inspiration and purity of the form of the classics, must resort to devices of invention, in order to make effective what would be a poverty-stricken display otherwise.

The Greek statue adorned with modern habiliments is ruined. To attempt to color the classics with exaggerated contrasts is to rob them of their intrinsic value.

I do not wish my readers to think that in my reasoning above I infer that Mr. Paur, like Mr. Nikisch, tries to improve the classics; not a bit of it; only if his great care would result in a more marked definition between pp and p, sf and f, and in not turning f into fff, he would at once become a most satisfactory interpreter of the old composers' works. The writer might be called hypercritical, or unreasonably fault-finding, had not Mr. Gerike for five years held up the model of perfection, that is advocated in these columns so frequently as the standard that should be preserved by his successors.

Anything that Brahms may produce is worthy of the careful attention of the musician, for in the science of music he stands pre-eminent.

It might be well at this time when such a statement is made to add also that here in our own city lives a master of composition in its every form, the equal of Brahms. If there is a musician who has proceeded upon the exalted forms of composition as exemplified in the works of Beethoven and Schumann it is Prof. John K. Paine. And yet how little is known of his works here among his own townsmen owing to the partisan spirit and foreign control that have existed in the dictation of the affairs of our home organization. But to return to the concerto of Brahms, a composition so difficult, so strange in its construction and so intricate withal that one must have a good knowledge of its characteristics to be enabled to speak critically of its value. At one hearing it seems as if the solo parts were merely accessory, for displaying at intervals the tremendous difficulties that can be put upon the instruments, rather than that they should stand as integral parts of the work as a whole. The first movement has some noble themes, and is elaborated in rather strict form of development, the most gratifying portions being the orchestral

114
The first movement is in the extreme. The second movement is charming in its reposed and melodious character, and the finale, viva e non troppo, shows Brahms in his greatest capacity, breadth and power being displayed in the working out of the themes in the composer's noblest style.

Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder overcame the difficulties of their separate parts in that artistic manner that marks all their efforts. They were recalled two or three times by the audience. Under the skilful conducting of Mr. Paur the orchestra played this number magnificently.

At the concert next Saturday evening the orchestra will play Schumann's No. 1 Symphony; three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and the Liszt Poem, "Fest-Klaenge." Mrs. Emil Paur will make her debut at these concerts on this occasion in a performance of the "Wanderer-Fantasy," Schubert-Liszt.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Notes.

In yesterday's edition of the Journal, Mr. Philip Hale takes Mr. Paur to task for failing to suitably remember the deaths of the two world-wide famous composers Gounod and Tschakowsky. As Mr. Hale reasonably remarks Mr. Paur has all the material at hand with which to pay tribute to the memory of these distinguished musicians. Even in conservative Leipzig it was considered necessary to play something of Gounod's, in honor of that eminent Frenchman, and to mark the ending of a great career in musical art. If we had here such Americans as Mr. Walter Damrosch or Mr. Vander Stucken, the native born musicians and conductors of New York, whose taste is not limited by any nationality and whose progressive spirit grasps the best of the works of the young and ambitious composers at home and abroad, we should no doubt have placed our community on record as one alive to the musical virtues and universal distinction of the eminent French and Russian composers who have so recently passed on to another life.

115
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY in B major, No. 1.
SCHUBERT-LISZT.	WANDERER FANTASY FOR PIANO AND ORCHESTRA.
BERLIOZ.	THREE MOVEMENTS FROM SYMPHONY. "Romeo and Juliet."
LISZT.	SYMPHONY POEM. "Fest-Klaenge."

Soloist:

MRS. EMIL PAUR.

114
tutti. These periods are masterly in the extreme. The second movement is charming in its reposeful and melodious character, and the finale, viva e non troppo, shows Brahms in his greatest capacity, breadth and power being displayed in the working out of the themes in the composer's noblest style.

Mr. Kneisel and Mr. Schroeder overcame the difficulties of their separate parts in that artistic manner that marks all their efforts. They were recalled two or three times by the audience. Under the skilful conducting of Mr. Paur the orchestra played this number magnificently.

At the concert next Saturday evening the orchestra will play Schumann's No. 1 Symphony; three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and the Liszt Poem, "Fest-Klaenge." Mrs. Emil Paur will make her debut at these concerts on this occasion in a performance of the "Wanderer-Fantasy," Schubert-Liszt.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Notes.

In yesterday's edition of the Journal, Mr. Philip Hale takes Mr. Paur to task for failing to suitably remember the deaths of the two world-wide famous composers Gounod and Tschakowsky. As Mr. Hale reasonably remarks Mr. Paur has all the material at hand with which to pay tribute to the memory of these distinguished musicians. Even in conservative Leipzig it was considered necessary to play something of Gounod's, in honor of that eminent Frenchman, and to mark the ending of a great career in musical art. If we had here such Americans as Mr. Walter Damrosch or Mr. Vander Stucken, the native born musicians and conductors of New York, whose taste is not limited by any nationality and whose progressive spirit grasps the best of the works of the young and ambitious composers at home and abroad, we should no doubt have placed our community on record as one alive to the musical virtues and universal distinction of the eminent French and Russian composers who have so recently passed on to another life.

115
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY in B major, No. 1.
SCHUBERT-LISZT.	WANDERER FANTASY FOR PIANO AND ORCHESTRA.
BERLIOZ.	THREE MOVEMENTS FROM SYMPHONY. "Romeo and Juliet."
LISZT.	SYMPHONY POEM. "Fest-Klaenge."

Soloist:

MRS. EMIL PAUR.

MRS. EMIL PAUR.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ.

THREE MOVEMENTS FROM SYMPHONY.

"Roméo et Juliette," op. 17.

Part II. ROMÉO SEUL. — — TRISTESSE: Andante malinconico e sostenuto. CONCERT ET BAL — — GRAND FÊTE CHEZ CAPULET. Allegro.

Part III. SCÈNE D'AMOUR: Adagio.

Part IV. LA REINE MAB, OU LA FÉE DES SONGES; Scherzo: Prestissimo. — — Trio: Allegretto.

SCHUBERT.

GRAND FANTASIA in C major. "Wanderer," op. 15.

(Symphonically re-arranged for Piano and Orchestra by Franz Liszt.)

I. Allegro con fuoco, ma non troppo.

II. Adagio.

III. Presto.

IV. Allegro.

SCHUMANN.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38.

I. Andante un poco maestoso.—Allegro molto vivace.

II. Larghetto.

III. Scherzo: molto vivace.

Trio I. Molto più vivace.

Trio II. Tempo primo.

IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

MRS. EMIL PAUR.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

Berlioz's symphonic setting of "Romeo and Juliet" is probably the most successful musical outcome of Shakespeare's tragedy. No literary work except Goethe's "Faust" has ever brought forth so much music. All the world loves a lover, and here was a pair of them ready to the musician's hand; as a consequence, overture, symphony and opera have been built upon the theme. Yet it is safe to say that the Shakespearian ideal has never been attained in the last-named form, spite of the efforts of Gounod, Bellini and a host of others. Berlioz had suffered the agony of love for an actual Juliet (the actress whom he subsequently married), and certain parts of his musical setting must have been almost auto-biographical; however this may be, it is certain that in the third part of his "Romeo and Juliet" symphony he attained a spontaneity which is far beyond that exhibited in his other works. The "balcony scene" is here presented in a picture to the ear as graphic as any painting that appeals to the eye. It is the idealized personification of instruments.

The absence of chorus and soloists made it impossible to present more than parts II., III. and IV., and the work began with the picture of Romeo in his solitary meditation, with the Ball of the Capulets in the distance. The picture was most clearly drawn, although the dance rhythm which formed the background could have been more elastic. There was a tendency to bring out the details en silhouette, which did not quite suit to the vague outlines which Berlioz has drawn. But it meant much to give so difficult a score so clean a performance, and both the technique of the orchestra and the intelligence of the conductor were well displayed in the movement. The oboe work was something exceptionally artistic, and Mr. Sautet deserves especial mention. The "balcony scene" was perfectly given and the tender dialogue of the lovers, the abrupt calls of the nurse, entire action, in short, was as dramatic and fully as poetic, as if the scene had been enacted by personages, which is an auspicious indication of the emotional capacities of Mr. Paur.

"Queen Mab" is one of those movements which Berlioz occasionally dragged in by the ears (as the death of Child Harold among brigands or the sending of Faust to perdition) to show his orchestral technique. Such movements are their own sufficient raison d'être, and the composer always shines in them. It was a technical triumph for all concerned, and if not as capricious as it has been heard here, was certainly clearer than we have had it in recent times.

Now came Schubert's piano fantasia, op. 15, magnified into a very free concerto by Liszt, with the piano part played by Mrs. Paur. This is the work which, like the creation of Frankenstein, overthrew its own maker, for Schubert was unable to play it; once he attempted it before an audience, and after three failures, sprang from the piano exclaiming, "Das Zeug mag der Teufel spielen!" Mrs. Paur did not follow Schubert's example, but played the movements in a very clear and intelligent manner. There was a trifle of formality in the presentation of the theme of "Der Wanderer," and there was more of precision than of abandon in other parts of the work, but the beautiful embellishments of the song, by the piano, while the melody appeared upon the 'cello and the horn (both played exquisitely) were worthy of praise, and the contrapuntal touches of the finale were brilliantly done. As yet we have found more of intelligence and musicianly fidelity in Mrs. Paur's playing, than of fire or enthusiasm. It is to her credit that she is not in the least sensational and attempts no tricks either personal or musical, to catch the multitude. The contrapuntal effects of the finale of the fantasia at once call to mind that in some respects Schubert was at the very beginning of his career when he died. Had he studied counterpoint (he made arrangements to take lessons of Sechter the week before he died) he might have been a greater composer than any of them all, except Bach, and would probably have reconciled contrapuntal complexity with melodic beauty more thoroughly than any other composer.

The concert ended with that outburst of spring and sunshine called "Symphony in B flat" by Schumann, but which narrowly escaped the deserved title of "Spring Symphony." There was something of timidity in the first horn and trumpet call, but these instruments were excellently played after this. Schumann originally wrote this call a third lower, a totally impracticable passage for the natural horns and trumpets which he employed, but as today we use the keyed horn and trumpet (ventil-horns in F are the only ones generally found in the modern orchestra) it might be well to restore the passage as it stood originally, using the notes B flat, G and A. As regards the trumpets this would be easy enough as they are at present. In this connection one may express the hope that we may yet have two natural trumpets in our orchestra. We were the first to abolish the desecration of substituting the cornet for the trumpet, why not make a step further in artistic progress in the same direction?

The symphony was beautifully played, with a sufficiency of energy yet without any suspicion of exaggeration, and became a pure delight from beginning to end.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Tonight the members of the Symphony Orchestra will attend the performance of "L'Enfant Prodigue" at the Boston Museum by invitation of the managers of the enterprise, and in recognition of Mr. Charles A. Ellis's courtesy in affording to members of the pantomime company an opportunity to hear the orchestra at a public rehearsal.

How little talk there is concerning Mr. Emil Paur. Like "Guvener B.," Mr. Paur

"Is a sensible man;

He stays to his home an' looks arter his folks;
He draws his furrer ez straight ez he can,
An' into nobody's tater patch pokes."

But if the excellent conductor of the Symphony concerts were just a little bit of a charlatan, would it not be better for the business?

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A conductor who can play the "Romeo and Juliet" of Berlioz in a way to satisfy a Frenchman, who can read the Schuman Symphony No. 1 in a manner to satisfy the strongest admirer of this great German writer, and who can conduct the orchestra in a performance of the Schubert-Liszt "Wanderer" Fantasia in a way to meet the approval of his wife, is a conductor to be proud of. This is what Mr. Emil Paur did last evening at Music Hall, and it is entirely safe to say that the great audience present were entirely satisfied with the newcomer in the work of the Symphony orchestra on this occasion.

Such a performance of the second movement of the Berlioz Symphony depicting the fete at the Capulets' house has never been heard here, and the audience was carried from one stage of enthusiasm to another until the excitement at the finale found vent in applause which must have surprised the new conductor. He certainly discovered from the impression created by this remarkable orchestral performance that a Boston public can always be relied upon to show its appreciation of good work done. His performance of the love scene was an exquisitely sentimental effort, the delightful Queen Mab Scherzo was played with a fascinating brilliancy and delicacy. It is questionable if any one present enjoyed this performance more than the conductor, and he showed his appreciation by the efforts of his men in the most emphatic fashion. Among the good work done by the leading instruments that of the first oboe deserves especial commendation. The purity of the tone and the skill shown by the player deserving the warmest commendation.

Following the Berlioz symphony came the appearance of Mme. Paur, who on this occasion took the piano part in the famous "Wanderer" fantasia. Her playing on this occasion confirmed the estimate made of her abilities upon the occasion of her recent appearance with the Kneisel quartet. She is a most enjoyable pianist, and in her playing she shows a warm musical nature, thorough skill, and absolute command of the key-board, and withall an intelligence that gives an especial charm to all her work. She recalls in many ways the playing of Mme. Schiller, although she lacks somewhat the force of her predecessor, and has not the strong personality which so distinguishes Mme. Schiller's playing. Her touch is delightfully pure and clear, and the beautiful theme of the second movement was sung upon the instrument in a most expressive manner. She met the demands of the finale with good success, and, altogether, created a most favorable estimate of her value as an orchestral player. She was most heartily received and recalled repeatedly after her conclusion of the fantasia. The great first symphony of Schumann ended the programme, and the masterly fashion in which it was interpreted met the severest criticism. Altogether, Mr. Paur emphasized his success in this concert in an unusual degree. Next Saturday R. Timothy Adamowski will be soloist, and the programme will include the Tchaikowsky concerto, Brahms' First Symphony, "The Magic Flute" overture and Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vitava."

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Mrs Paur the Soloist at the Sixth Symphony Concert—Past and Coming Events in the Musical World.

Mrs Paur, the wife of the highly esteemed director of the Symphony orchestra, was the soloist at last night's concert. Her appearance was looked forward to with much pleasurable anticipation, and it can be said that she fulfilled all the kindly expectations awakened in her behalf.

The cordial plaudits which greeted her appearance were repeated with many times multiplied fervor at the conclusion of her playing of Liszt's arrangement for piano and orchestra of Schubert's charming fantasia in C major. There were four recalls, and there was no question as to the honesty of the enthusiasm displayed.

She can scarcely be called a brilliant player, brilliant in the sense of marked individuality, great force or showy accomplishments, but she is a pianist whose playing affords much pleasure.

She does not seem possessed of much physical strength, and her tone is slight, even for a woman. There were times yesterday when she could scarcely be said to have held her own with the orchestra, admirably as it was controlled by conductor Paur.

But her touch was sure, and the tone brought forth clear and exact, so the effect was never otherwise than pleasing. Her technique seems equal to all requirements. She plays with delightful ease. There is nothing of an ostentatious character about her work. She gives a faithful, unassuming reflection of the composer's writing.

In the softer passages of the fantasia her playing was altogether delightful. Then there was sufficient delicacy of expression, grace and finish of execution to fairly compensate for the shortcomings in the more forcible and showy movements.

The other numbers constituting the program of yesterday's concert were three movements (second, third and fourth) of Berlioz' symphony "Romeo and Juliet" and Schumann's No. 1 symphony. Although the advisability of placing practically three symphonies on one program may be questioned, Mr Paur's selections were of such a varied character and all were so splendidly interpreted that one cannot find fault with him.

The Berlioz symphony, one of the most novel, interesting and brilliant orchestral works ever written by this wonderful composer, was charmingly performed. Especially delightful was the interpretation of the third movement, or love scene, as it is termed. The Schumann symphony was given with intelligence and artistic effect.

The program for the next concert will be as follows: Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Brahms; overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; concerto for violin, Tchaikowsky; symphonic poem, "Vitava," Smetana; soloist, Mr T. Adamowski.

Mrs. Paur made her debut as a full concert pianist at the Symphony last night, and it was successful, an unusually large number of recalls testifying both to her merit as an artist and her interesting personality. It cannot be denied that she has not the solid strength or the resplendent technique for rising with ever crescent life and light to a great climax and her best field will probably be ultimately decided upon as lying within the limits of pure chamber music. For clear and even as is her touch, just and symmetrical her phrasing, skillful and knowing her use of the pedal, direct and legitimate her employment of her means, she cannot keep the solo instrument quite to the fore in the larger ensembles nor can she make its embroideries flash out above and around the formal orchestral demonstration of a subject. But she has the sensitive spirit to her finger-tips, so that her work shows quality always and is not unsatisfactory in its intellectual or artistic presentment, however much we may feel that it would be enhanced in value by more ardor or even by a little more sheer weight of force. Yet much praise is due to her also because she plays according to her own nature and her physical constitution and falls not into the common error of attempting to simulate a passion which is foreign to her or to supplement her proper strength by factitious noise. Her work with the orchestra followed the same plan which she outlined in previous concerts, and was unostentatious, fair-minded, interested, proportionate and equitable. Her selection was the rarely heard but admirably compounded orchestral arrangement made by Liszt from Schubert's "Wanderer" fantasy.

The other numbers on the programme were two—the usual orchestral excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" music and Schumann's great first symphony in B flat. The performance of these powerfully contrasted works showed that conductor and orchestra are getting into close rapport, and that the fears that he might prove a formalist—or "a d—d Austrian drill-master," as Johnny P— called him—may take to themselves wings and set out fast upon their flight. In the rendering of the Berlioz were romance, soft sensitiveness and subdued feeling for the scenes of despondency, hope, love and grief, while for the revelry of the festal night there were clangor, flash and swing, and for the fairy fancies of Mercutio's Queen Mab imaginings an airy lightness of fluttering flight crossed by the distinct figures of the various visions. The Schumann, on the other hand, was broad, firmly knit and resonant—a little qualified, indeed, by Mr. Paur's disposition to hold and mould passing phrases, but as a whole noble and earnest.

Next week's programme is this: Brahms' first symphony; Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture; Tchaikowsky's violin concerto, with Mr. Adamowski to play it, and Smetana's poem, "Vitava."

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

MUSIC. Saxette

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was, parts 2, 3 and 4 of the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony by Berlioz; Schubert's C-major Fantasia, rearranged by Liszt, and Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B-flat. Mrs. Emil Paur was the soloist. The playing of the orchestra was up to its very best standard from the beginning to the end of the concert. The movements from the Berlioz work were read with rare beauty of conception, and more was made out of them, and a clearer and more interesting understanding was had of them than we can remember to have been vouchsafed at any earlier performance of them here. The "Love Scene" was exquisitely colored, and the "Queen Mab" scherzo was given with fascinating delicacy, and with a precision and a finish that displayed the technique of the orchestra to the finest advantage. The Schumann symphony was interpreted along conventional lines, and with brilliant and satisfying effect. In fact, in these two works Mr. Paur did his best work of the season thus far, and increased the respect for his abilities which he had hitherto won. Mrs. Paur's performance of the Fantasia was marked by much delicate technical finish, accuracy, and frank straightforwardness. She seemed to be wanting in physical power in the more vigorous moments of the work, and her reading of it was somewhat colorless; but her execution was very neat, and her style, if somewhat cold and formal, was refined. She was warmly applauded and received three recalls. The selections for the next concerts are: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; Overture "Magic Flute," Mozart; Concerto for violin, Tchaikowsky; Symphonic Poem, "Vitava," Smetana. The soloist is Mr. T. Adamowski.

THE SYMPHONY.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" (2d, 3d and 4th movements). Berlioz
Grand Fantasia in C major, "Wanderer" Schubert
Symphony No. 1 in B flat major. Schumann
Mrs. Emil Paur was the soloist.

The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was excellent, for only in the last movement of the Schumann Symphony was there any discrepancy observed. An exact precision was wanting in the wind instruments at the beginning of this movement, but this may have been because of the slower tempo that was taken by Conductor Paur, slower than that of any of his predecessors, the players not being quite prepared for so slow a pace. The shortcoming in the playing was immediately remedied, but I don't think that the slower tempo improved the movement.

The Berlioz number was admirably performed. Mr. Paur's conception of the great Frenchman's composition is to be commended and one observes with gratification the manner in which Mr. Paur devotes his whole soul to his work. The delicacy with which he touched the scherzo has never been surpassed in these concerts.

The "Wanderer" fantasia, which Liszt symphonically rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra, gave Mrs. Paur the opportunity to display her refined, classical taste and facile, clean technique. Within a certain scope Mrs. Paur plays admirably, but her apparently impassionate nature and lack of power rather subject her to limita-

122

...that serve in keeping her within the circle of effective concert artists in the broader sense. Mrs. Paur's capacity seems to be rather that of an excellent chamber music performer, or a salon player, if one does not demand warmth of temperament in the latter.

Mr. Paur was not as discreet in directing the accompaniment in this number as he should have been. Almost always it was too loud, and even boisterous sometimes. It was rather a surprise that he should have offended in this manner, for his accompanying has generally been quite judiciously managed.

Next Saturday evening, if the programme be not rearranged in the meantime, we shall hear Brahms's Symphony No. 1; overture to "Magic Flute," Mozart, concerto for violin, Tchaikovsky, and "Vltave," a movement from a symphonic poem by Swetana, entitled "My Fatherland." Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestral Concert. Nov 15/93

WE have heard the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and we are bound to confess that our opinion of him coincides perfectly with that expressed by our Boston colleagues. The first concert this season of the superb organization from Boston took place last Wednesday night at Music Hall, the auditorium of which is vastly more suitable for orchestral concerts than Chickering Hall. When Mr. Paur made his appearance to conduct Beethoven's immortal Fifth symphony he was accorded a hospitable, even a warm reception, and it did not stop there. He was called out several times in the evening and at the close of the performance. In a word, Mr. Paur was given a fair hearing, and although one concert has probably not revealed all of his possibilities as a conductor, he nevertheless gave us a taste of his quality and a very fair idea of his potentialities.

Mr. Emil Paur is a respectable but by no means a great conductor. He is no virtuoso, though very vigorous, and at first blush seemed more muscular than musical. He has, however, many excellent qualities to recommend him to our attention. There is no mistaking his beat. It is precise to harshness. His rhythmical feeling overbalances his poetic conception; he literally hews out his phrases and leaves you no doubt as to his intentions. But he is reverent, earnest and sincere to a fault. He has been trained in a very severe school—a school in which a sort of traditional truthfulness, even realism prevails at the expense of beauty.

In a word, Mr. Paur is hard, reserved to coldness and personally unsympathetic. Indeed, of the personal magnetism of his predecessor, Mr. Nikisch, he possesses absolutely nothing. He has the unyielding temperament of the Teuton. He would sacrifice all to the letter of the law, and let poor poetry knock in vain at the outer gate of our hearts. Europe has many such conductors, particularly in Germany. There they bear the respectable name of "Kappellmeister." America is not without their representatives, although they are by no means so many as a morning paper declared last week.

123

Mr. Paur is musicianly.

Mr. Paur is a great student. He gives you less of a "reading" than what might be called an anatomical demonstration in phrasing. You hear everything when he conducts, even if it does not sound beautifully. The cold, white light that he sheds over Beethoven does not warm you. It is too wintry; too scholastic. All the finesse and good taste which were the dominant traits of Mr. Gericke's conducting, Mr. Paur knows not, but he impresses you as having mastery over his men and getting from them what he wants. The only trouble about this is, that what he wants is not what we want. We should be tired, at least we have been told so by Boston critics, of magnetic conductors, of conductors who use the tempo rubato, of exaggerated and romantic readings, but nevertheless we cannot help drawing a fatal comparison between Mr. Paur and Mr. Nikisch. Mr. Nikisch is quite as much of an analyst as Mr. Paur. He may have sinned against the eternal verities of the classics, but he fascinated you by his warmth, luminosity and fiery temperament. Mr. Paur does not fascinate at all; to tell the truth he comes dangerously near boring one.

To give a new reading to the C minor symphony of Beethoven without violating its structural contents would be nowadays almost an impossibility; as great an impossibility as to dig a delve for a new interpretation of "Hamlet," so we had a conventional performance of the symphony, except that it was played in rather a leaden, spiritless fashion with its phrases detached, the whole lacking in sweep and spontaneity. In the second movement the andante was mechanically well balanced as far as tone, and absolutely without poetry. The scherzo was respectable, while the last movement was the best played of the four. Its honest, straightforward themes suited Mr. Paur's style. Naturally a Dvorák composition would not be within the ken of this conductor, so the "Slavonic Rhapsody" No. 2, in G minor, op. 45, was given without abandon or variety of moods and without color. It is a charming work, full of the fine, bold, free rapture of the Bohemian composer. The same may be said of the last number on the program, Hector Berlioz' overture "Benvenuto Cellini."

Mr. Paur has been spoken of as an excellent conductor for a male singing society. This is a one-sided criticism. To conduct a male singing society is no mere facile thing, as Mr. Van der Stucken will testify. But that Mr. Paur should be at the head of that superb band of Boston is we think a mistake in judgment on the part of Colonel Higginson.

We learn there has been no contract consummated between the new conductor and Colonel Higginson. This is lucky, for ten years of Paur would not only reduce the clientèle of this orchestra, but would also reduce the orchestra to a barrel organ condition of mechanical perfection and hard musical playing. Emma Eames was the singer on this occasion. She gave us Jules Massenet's aria, "Pleurez tions that serve in keeping her without the circle of effective concert artists in the broader sense. Mrs. Paur's capacity seems to be rather that of an excellent chamber music performer, or a salon player, if one does not demand warmth of temperament in the latter.

Mr. Paur was not as discreet in directing the accompaniment in this number as he should have been. Almost always it was too loud, and even boisterous sometimes. It was rather a surprise that he should have offended in this manner, for his accompanying has generally been quite judiciously managed.

Next Saturday evening, if the programme be not rearranged in the meantime, we shall hear Brahms's Symphony No. 1; overture to "Magic Flute," Mozart, concerto for violin, Tchaikovsky, and "Vltave," a movement from a symphonic poem by Swetana, entitled "My Fatherland." Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mar. 15/93 Concert. Nov 15/93

WE have heard the new conductor, Mr. Emil Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and we are bound to confess that our opinion of him coincides perfectly with that expressed by our Boston colleagues. The first concert this season of the superb organization from Boston took place last Wednesday night at Music Hall, the auditorium of which is vastly more suitable for orchestral concerts than Chickering Hall. When Mr. Paur made his appearance to conduct Beethoven's immortal Fifth symphony he was accorded a hospitable, even a warm reception, and it did not stop there. He was called out several times in the evening and at the close of the performance. In a word, Mr. Paur was given a fair hearing, and although one concert has probably not revealed all of his possibilities as a conductor, he nevertheless gave us a taste of his quality and a very fair idea of his potentialities.

Mr. Emil Paur is a respectable but by no means a great conductor. He is no virtuoso, though very vigorous, and at first blush seemed more muscular than musical. He has, however, many excellent qualities to recommend him to our attention. There is no mistaking his beat. It is precise to harshness. His rhythmical feeling overbalances his poetic conception; he literally hews out his phrases and leaves you no doubt as to his intentions. But he is reverent, earnest and sincere to a fault. He has been trained in a very severe school—a school in which a sort of traditional truthfulness, even realism prevails at the expense of beauty.

In a word, Mr. Paur is hard, reserved to coldness and personally unsympathetic. Indeed, of the personal magnetism of his predecessor, Mr. Nikisch, he possesses absolutely nothing. He has the unyielding temperament of the Teuton. He would sacrifice all to the letter of the law, and let poor poetry knock in vain at the outer gate of our hearts. Europe has many such conductors, particularly in Germany. There they bear the respectable name of "Kappellmeister." America is not without their representatives, although they are by no means so many as a morning paper declared last week.

Mr. Paur is musicianly.

Mr. Paur is a great student. He gives you less of a "reading" than what might be called an anatomical demonstration in phrasing. You hear everything when he conducts, even if it does not sound beautifully. The cold, white light that he sheds over Beethoven does not warm you. It is too wintry; too scholastic. All the finesse and good taste which were the dominant traits of Mr. Gericke's conducting, Mr. Paur knows not, but he impresses you as having mastery over his men and getting from them what he wants. The only trouble about this is, that what he wants is not what we want. We should be tired, at least we have been told so by Boston critics, of magnetic conductors, of conductors who use the tempo rubato, of exaggerated and romantic readings, but nevertheless we cannot help drawing a fatal comparison between Mr. Paur and Mr. Nikisch. Mr. Nikisch is quite as much of an analyst as Mr. Paur. He may have sinned against the eternal verities of the classics, but he fascinated you by his warmth, luminosity and fiery temperament. Mr. Paur does not fascinate at all; to tell the truth he comes dangerously near boring one.

To give a new reading to the C minor symphony of Beethoven without violating its structural contents would be nowadays almost an impossibility; as great an impossibility as to dig a delve for a new interpretation of "Hamlet;" so we had a conventional performance of the symphony, except that it was played in rather a leaden, spiritless fashion with its phrases detached, the whole lacking in sweep and spontaneity. In the second movement the andante was mechanically well balanced as far as tone, and absolutely without poetry. The scherzo was respectable, while the last movement was the best played of the four. Its honest, straightforward themes suited Mr. Paur's style. Naturally a Dvorák composition would not be within the ken of this conductor, so the "Slavonic Rhapsody" No. 2, in G minor, op. 45, was given without abandon or variety of moods and without color. It is a charming work, full of the fine, bold, free rapture of the Bohemian composer. The same may be said of the last number on the program, Hector Berlioz' overture "Benvenuto Cellini."

Mr. Paur has been spoken of as an excellent conductor for a male singing society. This is a one-sided criticism. To conduct a male singing society is no mere facile thing, as Mr. Van der Stucken will testify. But that Mr. Paur should be at the head of that superb band of Boston is we think a mistake in judgment on the part of Colonel Higginson.

We learn there has been no contract consummated between the new conductor and Colonel Higginson. This is lucky, for ten years of Paur would not only reduce the clientèle of this orchestra, but would also reduce the orchestra to a barrel organ condition of mechanical perfection and hard musical playing. Emma Eames was the singer on this occasion. She gave us Jules Massenet's aria, "Pleurez mez yeux," from "Le Cid," not a very interesting or inspired composition, and an aria from the "Marriage of Figaro." She sings with her old-time finish, and with more flavor. Her voice has lost none of its freshness, while it has gained considerably in volume and musical quality. She is more beautiful than ever. The consensus of opinion as to the merits of the new conductor is that he is an excellent musician, a sober and uninteresting leader. It may be that his angularity and awkwardness will wear off in time. Let us hope so at all events. The personnel of the orchestra is comparatively unchanged, Mr. Kneisel being at the first desk as usual, and even Mr. Paur's uncompromising beat could not rob the playing of the band of its elasticity and brilliancy. The second concert occurs December 14.

124

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixth Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Three Movements from the Symphony "Roméo et Juliette," Opus 17.
Schubert: Fantasia in C major ("Wanderer"), Opus 15, symphonically rearranged for Piano-forte and Orchestra by Liszt.
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Opus 38. Mrs. Emil Paur was the pianist.

A delightful programme, if ever there were one. The three movements—"Romeo alone, Fête at Capulet's house;" "Love-scene;" and "Queen Mab" from the "Roméo et Juliette" symphony, lose a good deal by being given out of their proper surroundings in the work; it is with them much as Berlioz himself said it was with the Pilgrims' March in his "Harold en Italie" symphony; "whenever the whole symphony was played, the March was always encored; but when the March was given by itself, it hardly got a hand!" Of the three movements in question the Love-scene undoubtedly suffers most. The "Romeo alone and Fête at Capulet's house" is the best adapted to stand by itself as an independent movement; in form it is very like a concert overture, with its slow introduction and long Allegro, and makes a fair pendant to the composer's overture to the "Carnaval Romain," with which it has much in common. To be sure, its exceedingly quiet and rather vague beginning makes more effect when it comes immediately after the solemn A minor chords that end the Prologue; still it finds little difficulty in standing on its own legs. But the Love-scene, beginning with those mysterious, soft 5ths on the flutes and clarinet, comes very strangely after the resounding closing climax of the "Fête at Capulet's," and much needs the little intervening scene of the young Capulets passing through the garden on their way home from the ball to put the listener into the right mood for it. The "Queen Mab" scherzo, on the other hand, loses nothing; it follows the Love-scene quite as when the whole symphony is given. Yet half a loaf is better than no bread, and it is better to hear these three scenes even at a slight disadvantage than not to hear them at all.

They were, one and all, wonderfully played; the performance per se left nothing to be desired. Here Mr. Paur's frequent modifications of the tempo were exactly in place and consequently wonderfully effective; the music needs them, and can not well do without them. Hans von Bülow once said, on being asked what sort of a conductor Berlioz was, that "he was absolutely superb, when conducting his own works, but that in the classical repertory he was a mere metronome." Bülow is a well known advocate of great rhythmic elasticity in orchestral performance, and his praise of Berlioz's conducting his own works—when taken together with his slighting remark upon his conducting of other things—plainly implies that he intended his own compositions to be played with considerable rhythmic freedom. With Berlioz the musical form is, in general, so loose-jointed and the development often so erratic that one does not feel the need of preserving that unity of tempo, without which a movement by Haydn, Mozart or Beethoven loses much of its unity of form. Berlioz seldom wrote impersonally; he treated the orchestra much as he would a solo instrument, as the medium through which he expressed his own personal emotion in a perfectly personal and individual way; his style was largely what the Germans call freiphantasierend, bound to no typical forms of expression, but reflecting every slightest momentary change in his own mood. One can imagine him standing at the head of his orchestra, as a pianist sits improvising at the pianoforte: letting his fancy carry him whither it will. His inspiration seldom crystallized into that closely knit and stoutly organic form we find in the works of the classic masters, which always has something of the elemental and impersonal in it. Accordingly his music is to be treated in a different spirit from theirs: in it the impulse of the moment rises superior to the general predetermined plan. Thus Mr. Paur's modifications of the tempo all seemed natural, they all responded to an inner necessity and vindicated their own reason of being; they never seemed obtrusive nor out of place. In a word, the playing of the three "Roméo et Juliette" movements was one of the finest triumphs of Mr. Paur and the orchestra.

125

Schumann's symphony, on the other hand, seemed to us to go less satisfyingly; the playing was generally clear enough and certainly lacked nothing in vigor and animation; but it was not always highly finished, and one felt that there was more in the work than the performance showed. It would be folly to call this symphony of Schumann's less exciting, even in a merely physical sense, than Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette,"—not to mention other comparisons that might be drawn between the two works—but there was no place in any of the four movements in which the orchestra produced so magnetic and overwhelming an effect as it did in the Coda of the "Fête at Capulet's"—from the point where the ascending scales in triplets begin, up to the end. And there is not a little in the Schumann symphony that ought to be quite as maddeningly effective as that.

Mrs. Paur made an exceedingly favorable impression in the Liszt-Schubert fantasia. That she is not physically quite strong enough to play with orchestra in the Music Hall must be admitted. This is fair criticism; no artist can claim immunity from criticism on the ground that her short-comings are not her own fault. Neither can it justly be said in this case that the orchestra unduly covered her playing; the orchestra played just right, it played the music as it was written. But, apart from this lack of physical strength, Mrs. Paur played the fantasia very beautifully indeed. In sentiment, conception, facility and clearness of execution, beauty of tone, and vitality of accent, she left nothing to be desired. Her concentration, not upon herself, but upon the music she is playing, is absolute; and how delightful this pure, musical, honest playing is! How it shows you the music, and nothing but the music! The charm of her playing may be thus summed up: she plays, as Brillat-Savarin would say, pour faire briller le compositeur—so as to let the composer shine!

The next programme is: Brahms, symphony No. 1, in C minor, opus 68; Mozart, overture to "Die Zauberflöte;" Tchaikowsky, concerto for violin; Smetana, symphonic poem, "Vltava." Mr. T. Adamowski will be the violinist.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

RUBINSTEIN. DRAMATIC SYMPHONY.

BRAHMS. VARIATIONS.

SCHUMANN. OVERTURE, "Manfred."

128

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.

- I. Un poco sostenuto.—Allegro.
 - II. Andante sostenuto.
 - III. Un poco Allegretto e grazioso.
 - IV. Adagio.—Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
-

MOZART.

OVERTURE to "Die Zauberflöte," in E flat major.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

TWO MOVEMENTS from the CONCERTO for VIOLIN, No. 2, in D major, op. 35.

- II. Canzonetta: Andante.
- III. Finale: Allegro vivacissimo.

SMETANA.

SYMPHONIC POEM. "Vltava."

Soloist :

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

Mr. Gericke, who had very pronounced ideas on the subject of programme making, generally placed the symphony last upon his programmes, saying "the effect of a masterpiece should not be lessened by hearing anything after it;" Mr. Paur evidently proceeds on a different theory, holding that the audience can best appreciate a long symphony while unfatigued by other music, and he therefore places the large instrumental epic first on his list. There is truth in both views, and certainly there seemed to be an advantage in hearing Brahms' most complex symphony at the outset. Shakespeare's apothegm that music is "to refresh the mind of man after his studies or his usual pain," is certainly not sustained by Brahms' C minor symphony, for its every measure demands active mental effort on the part of the auditor. The first movement especially is full of "life's endless toil and endeavor," and there are few passages suggestive of repose in its deeply intellectual scheme. It is sufficient praise to say that it was clearly played, and, excepting a preponderance of kettle drum, with excellent balance of parts. The two interior movements were admirably shaded and the woodwind did excellent work. The finale is, to the reviewer at least, the finest part of the work; here one finds an epitome of all the movements, an idea possibly suggested by the instrumental part of the finale of Beethoven's ninth symphony. This movement was played with great breadth, but there were certain points in the reading which differed from the interpretation of any of the three preceding conductors. The striking effect of the accelerando in the pizzicato passage was avoided altogether, the phrase being taken with a deliberation which was new and scarcely advantageous. On the other hand, the majesty with which the theme upon the brasses was played deserves commendation. It was a welcome surprise to find the public becoming enthusiastic over this, and the critic can join in the popular verdict, even while recommending a restoration of the accelerated style of the pizzicati spoken of above.

The "Magic Flute" overture was taken at a breakneck speed, once the introduction was passed. Mr. Paur has plenty of precedent here, and even the cautious and conservative Mr. Gericke used to give this fugato (the most beautiful fugal exposition in the world) at a presto pace. It is wrong, though, for all that; Mozart marked it "allegro" and the beauty of its subject, the exact relation of its answer, and the effect of the wind passages, are all lost by an exaggerated speed. A thousand precedents would not justify this tempo.

Mr. Adamowski, the soloist of the concert, came rather late upon the programme, with two movements of Tchaikowsky's violin concerto in D major. What wonderful effects this Russian achieved with the wind instruments! They formed a most impressive background to the sadness expressed by the violin in the slow movement. Perhaps the only fault of the work as a composition, however, is that the orchestra is too often kept as a background. Beethoven and Brahms have taught the world what a true concerto should be—an orchestral composition with a thread of solo running through its warp and woof. This the work in question was not, for it gave constant prominence to the soloist, and often in passages of greatest virtuosity. In the slow movement Mr. Adamowski played with great expression and with absolute surety. Russian sadness is the deepest melancholy to which a musical composer can ever attain; the Slav goes to extremes in his tonal emotions. When he is glad he is very, very glad, and when he is sad he is horrid. Mr. Adamowski was best in the melancholic side of the question, for in the allegro he seemed over-weighted at times. There is scarcely a technical point of difficulty which does not appear here (except double harmonics). Following the example of Mendelssohn the composer has the cadenza long before the close. Skips, double stopping in chromatic passages, harmonics natural and artificial, and a host of other difficulties were overcome, but not with absolute ease. One felt a trifle anxious at times, a feeling not conducive to the full success of the work. There were, however, no important slips to condone, and the artist was most heartily applauded, and deserved to be.

After the Southeastern Slav came the Western branch in the shape of a Czech, and Smetana's river picture "Vltava" brought the concert to a close. This was a very changeable musical panorama, but through it all there ran the ripple of the stream, and there was coherency even in the midst of contrast. There were moments when the effect would have been enhanced by a slower tempo, and the dance rhythm seemed too ponderous and inelastic, but as a whole the work was effectively performed and it was evident that even the outré touches of this and the preceding number were by no means Caviare to the general.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Adamowski.

Farewell Concert by the German Bands Tonight—Marie Decca's Re-appearance—Continued Success of "Venus"—The Handel and Haydn Season—Events of the Week—Notes.

The programme of the seventh of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given at Music Hall last evening, had as its leading features a performance of the first of the Brahms symphonies, and the appearance of Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist.

In his reading of the first of the symphonic conundrums propounded by Brahms, the new conductor made its meaning as clear as any of his predecessors, and he had the satisfaction of having his efforts in elucidating its mysteries fully appreciated. The beauties of the last movement were given with rare clearness, and the finale was worked up with splendid fire and energy. The performance of the symphony added another to the former triumphs of the new conductor.

132

Mr. Adamowski selected for his annual appearance as soloist in these concerts two movements—the canzonetta and the finale of the violin concerto No. 2, op. 35, by Tchaikowsky. He had his usual hearty reception as he stepped to the soloist's place, and his popularity with his public was as distinctly shown as in former years. In the canzonetta his playing had all the delightful characteristics which made and have maintained his favor with American audiences—the purity of his tone, the sympathetic quality of his playing and the feeling and expression with which he interpreted this movement giving great satisfaction. In the finale his success was equally great. Mr. Adamowski is not altogether suited to the demands of such a composition, as he lacks the freedom and dash of the virtuoso, but he gave the movement with fine finish and great brilliancy despite this characteristic of his play. He was warmly commended by his audience for his performance.

A highly artistic reading of the "Magic Flute" overture and a very satisfying performance of Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau" completed the programme.

Echoes from the Symphony—Several Benefit Concerts Tonight—Coming Events.

The program offered by director Paur for the seventh Symphony concert consisted of Brahms's first symphony, the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute," Friedrich Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau," and the second and third movements of Tchaikowsky's No. 2 concerto for violin, with Mr. T. Adamowski as soloist.

The Friday afternoon performance was more suggestive of its name of rehearsal than is often the case with this splendid band, but the shortcomings of the orchestra were such as to be noticed only by comparison with its generally almost perfect work.

It was, however, surprising that the soloist should have proved so unfamiliar with, or forgetful of, the music selected for interpretation that it became necessary for him to receive assistance from the score on the conductor's desk. This break might have demoralized a less perfectly trained orchestra, and resulted disastrously to a soloist who had less command of himself.

As it was the incident probably passed unobserved by many in the audience, for there were demonstrative plaudits and three recalls for Mr. Adamowski after he had played the concerto.

Mr. Adamowski is such a strong social favorite that it is probable a majority of the Friday afternoon gathering would have been thoroughly well satisfied with a much less meritorious performance than he did give.

An extended review of his playing is not necessary. He is, of course, an intelligent musician and possesses more than common talent, but there are so many violinists of great ability that there seems no reason for going into raptures over his performance.

He played the Tchaikowsky concerto with refinement and good taste, and brought out its delicious melodies with good effect. His tone was not always clear, however, in the passages where a high degree of skill in technique was required.

The Brahms symphony received splendid interpretation from Mr. Paur. A more intelligent or satisfactory reading of this truly grand composition has seldom if ever been given here. The symphony is severely scholarly in style, and that its performance should have awakened so much enthusiasm is certainly very complimentary to Mr. Paur, and this is said without any intentional reflection upon the musical intelligence of the audience. The second and third movements, the latter especially, might have been better played at the Friday rehearsal, but the brilliant final movement was superbly interpreted.

The Mozart overture was gracefully and artistically performed, and a genuine treat was offered those of the audience who profess to know more about melody than harmony by the exceedingly dainty and expressive interpretation given Smetana's lovely little poem, "The Moldau."

The program announced for the eighth symphony concert is as follows: Dramatic symphony, Rubinstein; variations, Brahms; overture, "Manfred," Schumann.

MUSIC.

The Seventh Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was as follows: Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms; Overture, "The Magic Flute," Mozart; First two movements from concerto for violin, D major, Tchaikowsky; Symphonic poem, "The Moldau," Smetana.

Brahms still excites discussion, and all are not yet ready to bow the knee to the son of the double-bass player of Hamburg. The discussion is protracted and often hot, because the followers of Brahms insist that you must take the works of "the Master" in bulk. Everything is "wonderful, wonderful, and most wonderful wonderful, and yet again wonderful, and after that out of all whooping!" These worshipers are not unlike Brahms himself, as described some years ago by Beauty-Kingston: "Loud, dictatorial, a little too obviously penetrated with a sense of his surpassing greatness." What marvel then that he who cannot admire or love honestly such a work as the C minor symphony is tempted to imitate the conduct of Count Laurencin in discussing Wagner, and is apt "to foam slightly at the mouth and to grind his teeth in a highly alarming manner."

After many hearings of the C minor symphony of Brahms I am almost reconciled to the Wagner of the Nibelungen period.

For if Wagner is constantly striving to make an effect on the public, Brahms seems to parody a phrase of Grillparzer, to be very busy in making an effect upon himself. The Ego of this symphony is not sympathetic; and whether this Ego is affected or not by the endeavor is of little importance to the outsider.

Joncières once said of one of Brahms's more popular symphonies that it was too full of brushwood. The phrase is expressive, and it may be applied more justly to the first than to the second symphony, which in comparison with the former is clearness itself. For the C minor symphony is obscure, wilfully obscure; and if, as some think, obscurity is synonymous with greatness, then the symphony is sublime. Let us admit cheerfully that there are fine passages; passages of an austere nobility; but how much spontaneous music is there in the work from beginning to end? Or is there one honest, or, dishonest dramatic appeal to a human emotion? But music must be emotional, or it is not genuine music. The chief pleasure inspired by such a work of Brahms seems to be the effort of the brain to detect wherein the pleasure lies. Such pleasure then implies a real or feigned intellectuality in the person who is or pretends to be pleased. It is not surprising that such works of Brahms are fashionable and heard with a petrified smile of rapt enjoyment, even when the work lasts an hour. And yet "how enduring life would be, were it not for its pleasures!"

In this symphony of Brahms the players seem to wander in a forest imagined by Maeterlinck. The forest is dark, although it is high noon, and the sky is clear. No birds sing in this forest. There are no wild-flowers in this forest; nor in this forest are there any trees of beauty. The trees, indeed, seem dream trees, seen in restless sleep. The players wander blindly. Alarmed, they call to each other; they sound their alarm together. They try to weep, but terror forbids tears. They try to be gay; but their jests fall without laughter. They suspect the presence of winged things. The air grows dull and heavy. Suddenly they come into clear ground, and they see a canal with green water. Beyond is a hospital, with the sick people looking out of the windows. A boat is dragged along, and queerly-dressed men and women sing a tune that sounds like unto a travesty of the hymn in Beethoven's 9th symphony. Then all is dark. The dreamer wakes. There is darkness. There is the remembrance of a dark dream.

Perhaps it was not the fault of conductor or orchestra, but the concert as a whole seemed dull. The marvelous overture of Mozart was taken at such a rapid pace that passages for the wood-wind were inaudible. I admit that there has been much discussion concerning the proper tempo of this allegro. But Mozart did not write certain passages for the wood-wind as a mere stop-gap; and when that which should be clear is muddy, and when the players are men of skill, the fault lies surely in the tempo chosen by the conductor.

How delightfully clear, however, is the design of this overture. Perhaps on account of this very clearness, and on account of the classic beauty of theme and development, the overture failed apparently to please as much as did the reading for one hour of the gospel of Brahms.

Mr. T. Adamowski played portions of the concerto for violin in D major by Tchaikowsky. Mr. Adamowski is not without the gift of awakening pleasing emotions. He often plays admirably; still, when he is at his best he is too apt to suggest a room hung with heavy tapestry, perfumed with pastils and tuberoses. He was applauded warmly, but Tchaikowsky called for a more heroic player.

PHILIP HALE

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the seventh symphony concert was as follows:

Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Opus 68.
Mozart: Overture to "Die Zauberflöte."
Tchaikowsky: Two movements from the Concerto for Violin, in D major, Opus 35.
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vltava."
Mr. Timothee Adamowski was the violinist.

The great Brahms symphony, greatest of the four, seemed to us taken too slow all through, save perhaps in the third movement. The first and last movements suffered especially from it. That the first theme of the first Allegro is no very sure guide to the tempo, of and by itself, may be readily conceded; but so much of the development of the movement runs on plain chords (two to the measure) that any over-slowness in the tempo is exceedingly liable to efface the whole Allegro character of the music and make it sound like an Andante. To be sure, the modern "slow Allegro" is in general peculiarly applicable to Brahms; it might almost be called his natural gait. Still there is such a thing as over-doing it, even with Brahms, and making it come dangerously near to being no allegro at all. Apart from this, the symphony was played with great force, and was most enthusiastically received by the audience. The time seems pretty distant now when this symphony was looked upon by audiences as a thing of terror merely.

The playing of the bright and beautiful "Zauberflöte" overture was of fair average excellence; but the orchestra covered itself with glory in Smetana's "Vltava"—which outlandish word means the river Moldau. This symphonic poem of Smetana's was a delightful surprise; so much of the Czech and Russian music we hear nowadays is of a sort to strike terror into the ears of the average listener who has no Slavic blood in his veins that one may well be pardoned for feeling a touch of surprise at anything so natural, easily flowing, and perspicuous as this "Vltava" coming from the pen of a thoroughbred Czech. It is by no means great music; the themes are perhaps rather commonplace than other wise,—one of them bears a terribly close resemblance to the tune of a little Austrian nursery ditty about a fox stealing a goose—but the music is all so sunny, the development so natural and coherent, the poetic suggestiveness so unforced and genial, and the orchestration so masterly at every point, that one listens to it with unfeigned pleasure. As a piece of scoring the work is especially remarkable in that it never lapses into mere eccentricity of color, never even reaches that point of super-refinement and, so to speak, orchestral dandyism some of the modern French masters have been guilty of; there is no affectation about it; it is simply the sort of scoring that insures a constantly beautiful quality of tone, rich without being cloying, enormously powerful and sonorous in the stronger passages, without ever being noisy. The orchestra played the poem to perfection.

The two movements of Tchaikowsky's second violin concerto played by Mr. Adamowski—Allegro and Andante, the second movement being played first—do not show the composer in a very characteristic or very brilliant light. The Andante is a pretty little canzonetta, graceful in melody and not without a certain sensibility; but it is in no wise superior to hundreds of pretty salon pieces for violin, with which the market is flooded. Perhaps, after all, it may conceal some virtue that appeals strongly to the Slavic sense; but music must have something more than "national" merit to be considered seriously on a concert basis. With the best will in the world, we cannot find the first movement otherwise than commonplace and dull; the themes lack distinction, the working-out for the solo instrument does not rise above the old Alard or De Bériot passage-work, and nothing in the movement gives one a very convincing reason for its having been written at all. Mr. Adamowski's playing was rather uneven; reaching the highest pitch of beauty of sentiment and elegance of phrasing in the broader cantilena, but falling somewhat short of due effectiveness in the more brilliant passages. In short, what we have heard of this concerto of Tschalkowsky's does not seem calculated to induce the goddess of Music to take down the bill she has had up in her window for some time: "Wanted—an effective Violin Concerto!" The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Manfred"; Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Rubinstein, "Dramatic" symphony, No. 4, in D minor, opus 95.

Acquaintance with the now almost familiar first symphony of Brahms cannot yet make its almost confusedly composite opening movement lucid or agreeable to many ears. Its tremendous vigor and determination, its unrelaxing persistence in pushing its fierce way along, its power and grasp of the means of thematic development must be felt at once and they have a great weight of influence. But this is chiefly the influence of an immense volume of energetic tonal figures forcing themselves onward in an excited and closely banded mass, and does not reconcile one to the strange and clamorous dissonances, the complications of counterpoint and the apparently conflicting cries which arise here and there in the musical tumult. But if one can get safely through this, then comes relief and balm in the succeeding movements. The serious suavity of the second movement, the lilting gayety of the third and the variety of the fourth come welcome with contentment, transparency, poetry and a sufficiency of vehemence and demonstrativeness to bring out the finale with the utmost sonority of which a band is capable. Mr. Paur's rendering, at last night's Symphony, was admirable in attention to the moods as well as the manner of the composer, and was received with great evidences of satisfaction, the applause—as was to be expected—being lightest after the first movement and most decided after the last.

The programme continued well with Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, which offered a charming contrast. Its opening adagio, with those few grand chords which give it solemnity, bridged well the distance between the potential stratus of the symphony and the merry themes, the rippling buoyant fugal passages and the airy fancies of the main body of the overture. The audience were quick to appreciate this, and their attention was close and their recognition immediate and emphatic.

The solo number came next—the second and third movements from Tschalkowsky's second violin concerto. These are, it will be remembered, a sweet and lovely canzonetta, presented almost naively in simplicity of diction and quaint but delicate embroidery of accompaniment, and a vivid and rapid finale based upon two themes of unmistakable Russian type. Mr. Adamowski was the player, and he won many eulogiums. His tone, always notably pure, soft and charming, was all itself; his expected delicacy of taste did not fail him, his execution was more easy and free than it sometimes is in music so difficult as this finale, and he very rarely in intonation, where he has been apt to be a little errant in awkward passages. Toward the close he needed a more nervous and rougher fashion of emphasis; but with this exception made, his performance may be given a very honorable place on the record.

The evening ended with an earnest, picturesque spirited and enthusiastic rendering of Smetana's really poetic orchestral scene, "The Moldau" River" the fine flowing fancies being fascinatingly clear and the statelier passages swelling out to the full strength of the orchestra.

Next week's programme is thus announced:—Rubenstein's "Dramatic" symphony; orchestral variations by Brahms, and Schumann's "Manfred" overture. It will not be a solo week.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

er the fashion aff...
he went away, this of 'moi and er: "Never invited from this man with the leaves upon his appear dressed in his usual gh of relief, and in the ear you say that, please ten all seem to agree ou would not look upon man." "No," he it with the eyes
he eyes of a man
more offensive th

with me, your up to be sent pon me for their Judge. "No, P

author of a well-k dinner one day of the distress
Sir Henry with for the animal he finally expre ignorance, and t say I did think
e my little dog, who wrote that ester is to be th

ater of Dr. and Perley Hall, ad
y at 7 o'clock.
r as maid of hon e's home on Lin

an ill-dressed d affection of than the gross
Hartitt. account increas wn the Lung A says a writer movements of demand the st

the thief actu at such broad antly dressed n to pour out r "that man a hed after the t
They had a g
his pursuer.
the polite Flo nd out of bre
lady with prof y sorry. I did no!" she repli t back from that did you w

An Attractive Programme Excellently Well Rendered.

The programme given at the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony, No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms.
Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart.
Two movements for Concerto for violin, No. 2.....Tschalkowsky.
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist.

The Brahms Symphony, which has been given previously in these concerts, three times by Henschel, three times by Nikisch and once by Gericke, is a noble specimen of its author's great scholarship. It is great in a scientific way, although the second movement is gracefully melodious and spontaneous, and the listener must, generally speaking, seek pleasure in following the masterly contrapuntal treatment of the composer upon the basis of an exercised intellectuality, rather than upon a stirring of the emotions. Consequently it is that the only performance in this city of this remarkable work that has done its author full justice was the one that Gericke conducted. The themes treated in an almost overelaborate manner, in the first movement in particular, need the infinite variety of the exact expression marked by the author, if the effect is to be relieved of an otherwise dryness that becomes wearisome in the working out. Mr. Gericke succeeded, in his acute conception of the author and with his marvellous ability as a drill master, in bringing forth the characteristics of this symphony, being thereby as eminent in his success, as the others named, including Mr. Paur, have been unsuccessful in displaying the work in its most favorable light. The audience Saturday evening became excited over the thundering of the last movement and recalled Mr. Paur again and again with loud applause.

The Mozart overture, however, fell flat upon these same listeners, whether because of the breakneck speed it was taken, thereby robbing it of its effect, or because the audience had not recovered from the effect of the loudness and excitement of the Brahms which had stunned its sensibilities for the time being.

"The Moldau," the second of six symphonic poems by Smetana entitled "My Fatherland," was played for the first time in this city and as far as I know for the first time in this country. The No. 1, "A Bohemian fortress," was played in New York some time since, these performances being probably the only ones that any of the series have received in this country. "The Moldau," which is supposed to describe a forest brook that flows on through Bohemia's valleys and ending in a mighty stream vanishes in the distance, contains within its pages much that were it developed in the playing as clearly as the composer has indicated in his score would prove a most interesting composition. It was, however, so roughly rendered that the brook became a rushing torrent and the mighty river a foaming and roaring Niagara. The constantly undulating figures in the strings that should represent the surface of the hurrying river were so submerged by the overloud playing of the wind instruments that they might as well have been at the bottom of the ocean as far as any opportunity was offered for their becoming a feature in the characteristic delineation intended by the composer. So constantly overloud was the whole performance that the grand fortissimo climax, just before the final pin moto, was without contrasted effect, utterly ruined, for there was nothing left to do except to make a little more noise at the ff. As for the following arpeggios in the strings they might as well have been omitted, for all the effect they had. It was hoped that this overloudness and coarseness had departed with Mr. Paur's predecessor. It would be interesting to hear "The Moldau" played with a due regard for the demands of the composition.

Mr. Adamowski played the second movement and the first movement in succession, of the Tschalkowsky violin concerto, No. 2. This concerto was played in its complete form by Mr. Adolf Brodsky at a Damrosch concert at the Tremont Theatre early in this year.

Its performance at that time excited much comment regarding its real value as a musical composition. The last movement militates the most against the acceptance of the work as a whole, and maybe Mr. Adamowski consequently substituted the allegro moderato for the finale. When Mr. Brodsky first played this concerto in Vienna, Dr. Hanslick, the eminent critic, severely criticised both the barbarity of the music and of the player's efforts, admitting, of course, the tenderness of the "Canzonetta." Without discussing whether the doctor was or was not a little too severe in his remarks, it is pleasant to note that Mr. Adamowski played the tender and melancholy canzonetta with fine feeling and great delicacy. So also did the player overcome the difficulties of the first movement without the rasping and fury that marked Brodsky's efforts, and with marked excellence in expression, technical facility and good intonation. Mr. Adamowski was warmly applauded and recalled. Great credit is due Mr. Paur for the delightful manner in which he accompanied the soloist.

The distressing manner in which the first clarinet played the theme in the andante of the Brahms Symphony, where it is taken up just as the oboe ends, both as regards bad intonation and inartistic style was not an agreeable feature of the playing on this occasion. Add to this the bungling manner in which this player executed the figure for clarinet and flute in unison at the beginning of the last movement of Schumann's B-flat symphony a week ago Saturday night, and it must be admitted that it is not creditable that such inability should be observed on the part of one holding a principal position in a first-class orchestra.

The following numbers are announced for next Saturday evening's programme: "Dramatic Symphony," Rubinstein; Variations, Brahms; Overture, "Manfred," Schumann.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

effectiveness in the more brilliant passages. In short, what we have heard of this concerto of Tschalkowsky's does not seem calculated to induce the goddess of Music to take down the bill she has had up in her window for some time: "Wanted—an effective Violin Concerto!" The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Manfred," Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Rubinstein, "Dramatic" symphony, No. 4, in D minor, opus 95.

Acquaintance with the now almost familiar first symphony of Brahms cannot yet make its almost confusedly composite opening movement lucid or agreeable to many ears. Its tremendous vigor and determination, its unrelaxing persistence in pushing its fierce way along, its power and grasp of the means of thematic development must be felt at once and they have a great weight of influence. But this is chiefly the influence of an immense volume of energetic tonal figures forcing themselves onward in an excited and closely banded mass, and does not reconcile one to the strange and clamorous dissonances, the complications of counterpoint and the apparently conflicting cries which arise here and there in the musical tumult. But if one can get safely through this, then comes relief and balm in the succeeding movements. The serious suavity of the second movement, the lilting gayety of the third and the variety of the fourth come welcome with contentment, transparency, poetry and a sufficiency of vehemence and demonstrativeness to bring out the finale with the utmost sonority of which a band is capable. Mr. Paur's rendering, at last night's Symphony, was admirable in attention to the moods as well as the manner of the composer, and was received with great evidences of satisfaction, the applause—as was to be expected—being lightest after the first movement and most decided after the last.

The programme continued well with Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, which offered a charming contrast. Its opening adagio, with those few grand chords which give it solemnity, bridged well the distance between the potential straits of the symphony and the merry themes, the rippling buoyant fugal passages and the airy fancies of the main body of the overture. The audience were quick to appreciate this, and their attention was close and their recognition immediate and emphatic.

The solo number came next—the second and third movements from Tschalkowsky's second violin concerto. These are, it will be remembered, a sweet and lovely canzonetta, presented almost naively in simplicity of diction and quaint but delicate embroidery of accompaniment, and a vivid and rapid finale based upon two themes of unmistakable Russian type. Mr. Adamowski was the player, and he won many ecstasies. His tone, always notably pure, soft and charming, was all itself; his expected delicacy of taste did not fail him, his execution was more easy and free than it sometimes is in music so difficult as this finale, and he very rarely in intonation, where he has been apt to be a little errant in awkward passages. Toward the close he needed a more nervous and rougher fashion of emphasis; but with this exception made, his performance may be given a very honorable place on the record.

The evening ended with an earnest, picturesque spirited and enthusiastic rendering of Smetana's really poetic orchestral scene, "The Moldau" River" the fine flowing fancies being fascinatingly clear and the statelier passages swelling out to the full strength of the orchestra.

Next week's programme is thus announced:—Rubenstein's "Dramatic" symphony; orchestral variations by Brahms, and Schumann's "Manfred" overture. It will not be a solo week.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

er the fashion aff... he went away, this of "Never invite... am with the leas... appear dressed in... gh of relief, and... ear you say that... pen all seem to ad... u would not loc... man." "No," he... it with the eyes... he eyes of a man... more offensive t...

with me, your... up to be sent... pon me for their... Judge. "No," a gleam of sunshine... thor of a well-k... dinner one day... of the distress... Sir Henry with... for the animal... he finally expre... ignorance, and... say I did think... my little dog... who wrote that... f the passages for the... ster is to be th... ter of Dr. and... Perley Hall, a... y at 7 o'clock... as maid of ho... e's home on Lin...

an ill-dressed... affection of... the gross... Hazlett... account increas... omprehended to excite... wn the Lung A... says a writer... movements of... lemand the ste... the thief actu... at such broad... antly dressed... n to pour out... r "that man sa... hed after the ti... They had a g... his pursuer... the polite Flo... nd out of brea... lady with prof... y sorry. I did... no!" she repl... t it back from... but did you w...

An Attractive Programme Excellently Well Rendered.

The programme given at the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony, No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms.
Overture to "The Magic Flute"....Mozart.
Two movements for Concerto for violin, No. 2.....Tschalkowsky.
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist.

The Brahms Symphony, which has been given previously in these concerts, three times by Henschel, three times by Nikisch and once by Gericke, is a noble specimen of its author's great scholarship. It is great in a scientific way, although the second movement is gracefully melodious and spontaneous, and the listener must, generally speaking, seek pleasure in following the masterly contrapuntal treatment of the composer upon the basis of an exercised intellectuality, rather than upon a stirring of the emotions. Consequently it is that the only performance in this city of this remarkable work that has done its author full justice was the one that Gericke conducted. The themes treated in an almost overelaborate manner, in the first movement in particular, need the infinite variety of the exact expression marked by the author, if the effect is to be relieved of an otherwise dryness that becomes wearisome in the working out. Mr. Gericke succeeded, in his acute conception of the author and with his marvellous ability as a drill master, in bringing forth the characteristics of this symphony, being thereby as eminent in his success, as the others named, including Mr. Paur, have been unsuccessful in displaying the work in its most favorable light. The audience Saturday evening became excited over the thundering of the last movement and recalled Mr. Paur again and again with loud applause.

The Mozart overture, however, fell flat upon these same listeners, whether because of the breakneck speed it was taken, thereby robbing it of its effect, or because the audience had not recovered from the effect of the loudness and excitement of the Brahms which had stunned its sensibilities for the time being.

"The Moldau," the second of six symphonic poems by Smetana entitled "My Fatherland," was played for the first time in this city and as far as I know for the first time in this country. The No. 1, "A Bohemian fortress," was played in New York some time since, these performances being probably the only ones that any of the series have received in this country. "The Moldau," which is supposed to describe a forest brook that flows on through Bohemia's valleys and ending in a mighty stream vanishes in the distance, contains within its pages much that were it developed in the playing as clearly as the composer has indicated in his score would prove a most interesting composition. It was, however, so roughly rendered that the brook became a rushing torrent and the mighty river a foaming and roaring Niagara. The constantly undulating figures in the strings that should represent the surface of the hurrying river were so submerged by the overloud playing of the wind instruments that they might as well have been at the bottom of the ocean as far as any opportunity was offered for their becoming a feature in the characteristic delineation intended by the composer. So constantly overloud was the whole performance that the grand fortissimo climax, just before the final pin moto, was without contrasted effect, utterly ruined, for there was nothing left to do except to make a little more noise at the ff. As for the following arpeggios in the strings they might as well have been omitted, for all the effect they had. It was hoped that this overloudness and coarseness had departed with Mr. Paur's predecessor. It would be interesting to hear "The Moldau" played with a due regard for the demands of the composition.

Mr. Adamowski played the second movement and the first movement in succession, of the Tschalkowsky violin concerto, No. 2. This concerto was played in its complete form by Mr. Adolf Brodsky at a Damrosch concert at the Tremont Theatre early in this year.

Its performance at that time excited much comment regarding its real value as a musical composition. The last movement militates the most against the acceptance of the work as a whole, and maybe Mr. Adamowski consequently substituted the allegro moderato for the finale. When Mr. Brodsky first played this concerto in Vienna, Dr. Hanslick, the eminent critic, severely criticised both the barbarity of the music and of the player's efforts, admitting, of course, the tenderness of the "Canzonetta." Without discussing whether the doctor was or was not a little too severe in his remarks, it is pleasant to note that Mr. Adamowski played the tender and melancholy canzonetta with fine feeling and great delicacy. So also did the player overcome the difficulties of the first movement without the rasping and fury that marked Brodsky's efforts, and with marked excellence in expression, technical facility and good intonation. Mr. Adamowski was warmly applauded and recalled. Great credit is due Mr. Paur for the delightful manner in which he accompanied the soloist.

The distressing manner in which the first clarinet played the theme in the andante of the Brahms Symphony, where it is taken up just as the oboe ends, both as regards bad intonation and inartistic style was not an agreeable feature of the playing on this occasion. Add to this the bungling manner in which this player executed the figure for clarinet and flute in unison at the beginning of the last movement of Schumann's B-flat symphony a week ago Saturday night, and it must be admitted that it is not creditable that such inability should be observed on the part of one holding a principal position in a first-class orchestra.

The following numbers are announced for next Saturday evening's programme: "Dramatic Symphony," Rubinstein; Variations, Brahms; Overture, "Manfred," Schumann.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

134
effectiveness in the more brilliant passages. In short, what we have heard of this concerto of Tschalkowsky's does not seem calculated to induce the goddess of Music to take down the bill she has had up in her window for some time: "Wanted—an effective Violin Concerto!" The next programme is: Schumann, overture to "Manfred," Brahms, variations on a theme by Haydn; Rubinstein, "Dramatic" symphony, No. 4, in D minor, opus 95.

Acquaintance with the now almost familiar first symphony of Brahms cannot yet make its almost confusedly composite opening movement lucid and agreeable to many ears. Its tremendous vigor and determination, its unrelaxing persistence in pushing its fierce way along, its power and grasp of the means of thematic development must be felt at once and they have a great weight of influence. But this is chiefly the influence of an immense volume of energetic tonal figures forcing themselves onward in an excited and close banded mass, and does not reconcile one to the strange and clamorous dissonances, the complications of counterpoint and the apparently conflicting cries which arise here and there in the musical tumult. But if one can get safely through this, then comes relief and balm in the succeeding movements. The serious suavity of the second movement, the lilting gayety of the third and the variety of the fourth come welcome with contentment, transparency, poetry and a sufficient of vehemence and demonstrativeness to bring to the finale with the utmost sonority of which the band is capable. Mr. Paur's rendering, at last night's Symphony, was admirable in attention to the moods as well as the manner of the composition and was received with great evidences of satisfaction, the applause—as was to be expected—being lightest after the first movement and most decided after the last.

The programme continued well with Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, which offered a charming contrast. Its opening adagio, with those grand chords which give it solemnity, bridged well the distance between the potential strains of the symphony and the merry themes, the rippling buoyant fugal passages and the airy fancies of the main body of the overture. The audience were quick to appreciate this, and their attention was close and their recognition immediate and emphatic.

The solo number came next—the second, third movements from Tschalkowsky's second violin concerto. These are, it will be remembered, a sweet and lovely canzonetta, presented almost naively in simplicity of diction and quite but delicate embroidery of accompaniment, and a vivid and rapid finale based upon two themes of unmistakable Russian type. Mr. Adamowski was the player, and he won many encomiums. His tone, always notably pure, soft and charming, was all itself; his expected delicacy of taste did not fail him, his execution was more easy free than it sometimes is in music so difficult as this finale, and he very rarely errs in intonation, where he has been apt to be a little errant in awkward passages. Toward the close he needed a more nervous and rougher fashion of emphasis; but with this exception made, his performance may be given a very honorable place on the record.

The evening ended with an earnest, picturesque spirited and enthusiastic rendering of Smetana's

MUSIC. Gazette

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, were: Symphony No. 1, Brahms; overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; two movements from the concerto for violin, No. 2, in D, Tschalkowsky, and Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau," Smetana. It was, on the whole, a dull and dry programme. The Symphony was industriously interpreted, not a point that was possible to make, was missed, and, on the whole, we doubt if the work has had a more elaborate reading than was accorded it by Mr. Paur. The resulting effect of all this minute care did not seem felicitous, for it emphasized the studious pedagogy of the composition and deprived it of what slight flexibility it has, and made it more severe and more tiresome than was necessary. Now and then, however, some portions of the work came out clearer than they did at any of its earlier performances here and the vigorous close of the finale was given with stirring power. The playing of the orchestra was steadily fine throughout. The applause at the close was very enthusiastic. The Mozart Overture came like a gleam of sunshine after the heaviness and the pedantry that preceded it. Here there is profound learning, but there is facility in the use of it, and the effect is as clear as crystal. It is possibly rank heresy to express the belief that there is more true music and more real genius in this one brief movement, than there is in the whole of the symphony, but we hold to that faith. Mr. Paur gave the tempo a very rapid pace; so rapid, in fact, that many of the passages for the wind instruments, especially for the bassoons, did not, and could not have been made to come out distinctly. The composer's indication is allegro, but it was construed into something very closely resembling the presto of the "Figaro" overture. It would seem though that this is the established modern view of the time in which the work should be played. The performance, which was admirable, was not rewarded with any very hearty applause. Perhaps the work is too easily comprehended to excite such approbation as attended the more vague music of Brahms. The last movement of the violin concerto was omitted. The andante was played first, and the opening allegro followed. Mr. Adamowski was the soloist, and he acquitted himself of his difficult task with skill and brilliancy. There was an occasional lapse in intonation in the more elaborate and trying passages, but the performance as a whole was able and interesting. Mr. Adamowski was warmly applauded and twice recalled. At the next concert will be played: Dramatic Symphony, Rubinstein; Variations, Brahms; Overture, "Manfred," Schumann. There will be no soloist.

An Attractive Programme Excellently Well Rendered.

The programme given at the seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony, No. 1, in C minor.....Brahms.
Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart.
Two movements for Concerto for violin, No. 2.....Tschalkowsky.
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau".....Smetana.
Mr. T. Adamowski was the soloist.

The Brahms Symphony, which has been given previously in these concerts, three times by Henschel, three times by Nikisch and once by Gericke, is a noble specimen of its author's great scholarship. It is great in a scientific way, although the second movement is gracefully melodious and spontaneous, and the listener must, generally speaking, seek pleasure in following the masterly contrapuntal treatment of the composer upon the basis of an exercised intellectuality, rather than upon a stirring of the emotions. Consequently it is that the only performance in this city of this remarkable work that has done its author full justice was the one that Gericke conducted. The themes treated in an almost overelaborate manner, in the first movement in particular, need the infinite variety of the exact expression marked by the author, if the effect is to be relieved of an otherwise dryness that becomes wearisome in the working out. Mr. Gericke succeeded, in his acute conception of the author and with his marvellous ability as a drill master, in bringing forth the characteristics of this symphony, being thereby as eminent in his success, as the others named, including Mr. Paur, have been unsuccessful in displaying the work in its most favorable light. The audience Saturday evening became excited over the thundering of the last movement and recalled Mr. Paur again and again with loud applause.

The Mozart overture, however, fell flat upon these same listeners, whether because of the breakneck speed it was taken, thereby robbing it of its effect, or because the audience had not recovered from the effect of the loudness and excitement of the Brahms which had stunned its sensibilities for the time being.

"The Moldau," the second of six symphonic poems by Smetana entitled "My Fatherland," was played for the first time in this city and as far as I know for the first time in this country. The No. 1, "A Bohemian fortress," was played in New York some time since, these performances being probably the only ones that any of the series have received in this country. "The Moldau," which is supposed to describe a forest brook that flows on through Bohemia's valleys and ending in a mighty stream vanishes in the distance, contains within its pages much that were it developed in the playing as clearly as the composer has indicated in his score would prove a most interesting composition. It was, however, so roughly rendered that the brook became a rushing torrent and the mighty river a foaming and roaring Niagara. The constantly undulating figures in the strings that should represent the surface of the hurrying river were so submerged by the overloud playing of the wind instruments that they might as well have been at the bottom of the ocean as far as any opportunity was offered for their becoming a feature in the characteristic delineation intended by the composer. So constantly overloud was the whole performance that the grand fortissimo climax, just before the final pin moto, was without contrasted effect, utterly ruined, for there was nothing left to do except to make a little more noise at the ff. As for the following arpeggios in the strings they might as well have been omitted, for all the effect they had. It was hoped that this overloudness and coarseness had departed with Mr. Paur's predecessor. It would be interesting to hear "The Moldau" played with a due regard for the demands of the composition.

135
Mr. Adamowski played the second movement and the first movement in succession, of the Tschalkowsky violin concerto, No. 2. This concerto was played in its complete form by Mr. Adolf Brodsky at a Damrosch concert at the Tremont Theatre early in this year. Its performance at that time excited much comment regarding its real value as a musical composition. The last movement militates the most against the acceptance of the work as a whole, and maybe Mr. Adamowski consequently substituted the allegro moderato for the finale. When Mr. Brodsky first played this concerto in Vienna, Dr. Hanslick, the eminent critic, severely criticised both the barbarity of the music and of the player's efforts, admitting, of course, the tenderness of the "Canzonetta." Without discussing whether the doctor was or was not a little too severe in his remarks, it is pleasant to note that Mr. Adamowski played the tender and melancholy canzonetta with fine feeling and great delicacy. So also did the player overcome the difficulties of the first movement without the rasping and fury that marked Brodsky's efforts, and with marked excellence in expression, technical facility and good intonation. Mr. Adamowski was warmly applauded and recalled. Great credit is due Mr. Paur for the delightful manner in which he accompanied the soloist.

The distressing manner in which the first clarinet played the theme in the andante of the Brahms Symphony, where it is taken up just as the oboe ends, both as regards bad intonation and inartistic style was not an agreeable feature of the playing on this occasion. Add to this the bungling manner in which this player executed the figure for clarinet and flute in unison at the beginning of the last movement of Schumann's B-flat symphony a week ago Saturday night, and it must be admitted that it is not creditable that such inability should be observed on the part of one holding a principal position in a first-class orchestra.

The following numbers are announced for next Saturday evening's programme: "Dramatic Symphony," Rubinstein; Variations, Brahms; Overture, "Manfred," Schumann.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SCHUMANN.	OVERTURE to "Manfred," op. 115.
BRAHMS.	VARIATIONS on a THEME BY HAYDN, in B flat major, op. 56A.
RUBINSTEIN.	"DRAMATIC" SYMPHONY, No. 4, in D minor, op. 95. I. Lento.—Allegro moderato. II. Presto. III. Adagio. IV. Largo.—Allegro con fuoco.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

THE SYMPHONY. Sym.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Overture to "Manfred". Schumann
 Variations and Finale on a theme by Haydn Brahms
 Dramatic Symphony, No. 4, in D minor Rubinstein

The overture to "Manfred," which has been given many times at these concerts, is a work of deep emotion and great beauty. If one does not exact the nicety of detail that goes so far towards enhancing the value of such passionate music, but is willing to accept the rendering in the light of a strong drawing in outline, then it must be said that the overture was effectively played.

The Brahms variations, show the unlimited resources of the author as a musical scientist, and although they may not appeal to the sentimental listener, to the musician they are interesting in the variety of the treatment of the theme, which often appears in a most ideal form. Here again the playing lacked in fineness of expression, although there was much to commend in the precision and rhythmic excellence with which the number was read.

The "Dramatic" Symphony of Rubinstein, which occupies 45 minutes in the playing, has been given in this city but once before to my knowledge, and that was in January, 1876, by Theodore Thomas's orchestra. Perhaps no one of the symphonic compositions of its eminent author shows his masterly genius in so vivid a light as this symphony, which he has pleased to entitle "dramatic." It is more fantastic, and in some portions sentimentally emotional, than strange, and far from dramatic, either in the older or more modern sense. The general character of the composition is certainly far from any resemblance to the mighty Wagner's modes of dramatic display, and does not in the least encroach upon that great innovator's forms of orchestral scoring.

The spontaneous genius, the masterly skill and the wide and deep emotional nature of Rubinstein are displayed, however, throughout this symphony, which is classical in its intention, if the pendulum does swing wide with its author's well-known fiery impulsiveness.

A want of space forbids an analysis of its movements, but it is sufficient to say that, regardless of its length, it is intensely interesting and commands the attention of the musical listener from beginning to end, even though the latter be not a profound musician, and this fact does not in the least detract from its value as a composition of deep and noble proportions.

The orchestra played the symphony with fine effect and Mr. Paur deserves great praise for the able manner in which he conducted the band through the difficulties of the composition. There are but two horns in the scoring of the symphony and they are used with fine effect. The horn solos by Mr. Harkenbarth, the first horn player of the orchestra, calls for especial mention, they were so delightfully and artistically rendered. So also in the Brahms "variations" this player took advantage of the many opportunities offered to display his beautiful tone and marked skill. The orchestra is to be congratulated upon the possession of such a rare performer.

Mr. Paur has not yet shown himself a master in programme making. He should also remember that he is no longer confined within the narrow limits of a Conservatory Leipsic, but is now upon the broad and expansive continent of America, that looks forth over the whole musical world for the best specimens of composition that exist in the musical repertoire of individual communities of every nation represented in high musical art. He should certainly acquaint himself with the works of worthy American composers and lend a hand in the encouragement of our native authors by producing in fair proportion the results of their artistic labors.

Mr. Higginson in his noble undertaking in the cause of art should manifest his patriotism in requiring that the foreign conductor who comes here to enjoy the financial benefits arising from the position accorded him, to say nothing of the fame to which thereby he may ascend, should exert himself in the advancement of American musical art by being liberally disposed towards a performance of the works of our best native composers whose ability, be it known, is sufficiently great to demand such recognition.

There will be no concert next Saturday evening. For the evening of Dec. 22 the programme announced is: Beethoven's Symphony No. 1; "Serenade," Mozart, with violin obligato by Mr. Kneisel; overture, "Rosamunde," Schubert. Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eighth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Opus 115.

Brahms: Variations and Finale on a Theme by Josef Haydn, in B-flat major, Opus 56a.

Rubinstein: "Dramatic" Symphony, No. 4, in D minor, Opus 95.

A pretty serious programme! The "Manfred" overture to begin with, which disputes with Beethoven's to "Coriolan" and Cherubini's to "Medea" the claim of being the most profoundly tragic overture in the world; then the Brahms variations, which show that the composer, as Wagner once said of him, was certainly not writing in joke; and, to conclude, the Rubinstein symphony, which is perhaps the toughest morsel our audience has had to chew on this winter.

The Schumann overture was admirably played; some points in it were taken differently from the way we have commonly heard the overture go, but the general effect was grandly inspiring. The second theme was given more passionately, with less pathos of expression than we have usually heard it, and that other theme which comes in (in the violas, 'celli, and bassoons) towards the end of the working-out, in C sharp minor, was given with greater tragic breadth and less of passionate, despairing fury than we have heard it before. This latter theme has always seemed to us to justify what a certain enthusiastic violinist once said of it, after taking part in a performance of the overture: "Ja! das wütht!" (Yes, that rages!); Mr. Paur gives it another expression, but we are by no means sure it loses thereby. As for the second, the so-called "Astarte" theme, we could not but feel that the passionate expression imparted to it by Mr. Paur's adhering unflinchingly to the "leidenschaftliches Tempo," at which Schumann has marked the whole movement, detracted a little from its feminine grace, beauty and appealing pathos—here, for once, we should have liked the tempo held back a little—but, per contra, this stronger and more fervid reading of the passage made the last dying return of the theme, when the flute just hints at it over the mournful harmonies in the other wind instruments, seem doubly beautiful and pathetic by contrast. In a word, Mr. Paur's conception of the whole overture is admirably self-consistent and proclaims its own reason of being quite unmistakably; it is in some ways new to us, but that is nothing against it. The performance was simply masterly.

The Brahms variations seem clearer, more masterly and instinct with genius every time one hears them; one feels little hesitation in calling them a truly great work. With all the learning and ever-growing elaboration with which Brahms has treated the theme, there is a great deal in the work that is wonderfully poetic and imaginative; the not infrequent allusions to the sacred character of the theme, the "Chorale Sancti Antoni," both in the style of writing and in the instrumentation, are exceedingly beautiful. And how satisfyingly and inspiringly the composer shows at moments that classic, "old Hellenic" serenity of mood which he alone of all modern writers has known how to preserve in music in all its beauty! In these variations, too, the orchestra was in its best form; the performance was admirable at every point.

The Rubinstein "dramatic" symphony is unquestionably a huge dose; yet one can easily understand and agree with many musicians in recognizing it as the composer's best symphony. That the quality of its thematic material nowhere places it on the high level of the first movement of the "Ocean" symphony may readily be conceded; but nowhere either does it suffer from such careless, slipshod, impotent working-out as does that otherwise great movement. The themes themselves in the "dramatic" symphony can not in general be called remarkable, even with the best will in the world; the development in all four movements is excessive, prolix, and more than the themes will bear; the terrible persistency of the key of D minor is exceedingly monotonous and provoking; after hearing the work, even those persons who have the faintest imaginable perception of absolute pitch ought to be able to recognize the key of D minor whenever they hear it. Then, too, the composer has not invariably steered clear of the trivial and tawdry; what he puts forth as "dramatic" sometimes bears an all too marked family resemblance to the "Meyerbeer-operatic."

Yet, with all these imperfections, which sorely mar the pleasure with which one listens to the work, one cannot but treat the composition with a certain respect. Here Rubinstein has shown for once that he was thoroughly in earnest, that he took himself quite seriously; he has evidently willed more in this symphony than in any other orchestral work of his we know. He does not give the impression of shirking anything, but writes on and on in the grimmest earnest. The very character of the orchestration is serious and restrained; Rubinstein has scored the symphony for the old Beethoven orchestra, with the usual pairs of wooden wind instruments, only two horns, with trumpets and drums, the three trombones appearing only in the Finale. Likely enough this moderation in the use of orchestral resources may have been prompted by a certain anti-Wagnerian bravado; but the orchestration is in general excellent and often exceedingly brilliant; it is far finer than the instrumentation in the "Ocean" symphony. In short, here is a work one can respect; could the composer cut it down by one-half, one might even wish to hear it again. The performance was very fine indeed.

The next programme is: Beethoven, symphony No. 1, in C major, opus 21; Beethoven, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, opus 58; Mozart, serenade with violin obligato; Schubert, overture to "Rosamunde," opus 26. Carl Baermann will be the pianist, and Mr. Franz Kneisel the violinist. The concert comes on Dec. 23: there will be no concert this week.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Events of the Coming Week —Symphony Concert.

The Boston Theatre Populare Begin
Tonight—Interesting Programmes at the Columbia and Hollis Street Theatres—Attractions in the Entertainment Courses—Notes

The element of frivolous enjoyment was carefully eliminated from the first half of last evening's symphony programme.

There were probably those who revel in a performance of the "Manfred" overture by Schumann, and those who are characterized by this peculiarity had their liking appealed to very successfully in Mr. Paur's performance of that unemotional composition. The tendencies of the audience in this direction were not shown to any considerable extent upon this occasion, but no exceptions can be taken to the reading of the work by Mr. Paur or its performance under his direction.

Following this tedious opening of the programme came Johannes Brahms' variations and finale upon a theme by Joseph Haydn, opus 56 A. The theme itself was delightfully played by the orchestra, and the men under Mr. Paur's direction were equally successful in dealing with the various treatments of the subject by Mr. Brahms, but just why Mr. Brahms should treat Mr. Haydn's theme in such a way, and why the audience should be compelled to listen to its performance, are questions for discussion.

The final work of the evening was Rubinstein's dramatic symphony No. 4, opus 95. The depression which had taken good hold upon the audience up to this time was not relieved by the lento and the largo of the opening movement, in which the mechanical side of the composer is made so prominent. With the beginning of the presto came a well appreciated relief from the monotony of the evening's work up to that point, and from that on to the grand finale of the symphony the performance was both entertaining and instructive. Better work has rarely been done by the players under Mr. Paur's direction than in the last three movements of this symphony, the beauties of the lovely adagio and the brilliant characteristics of the final allegro being brought out in splendid fashion.

The orchestra makes its occasional tour next week, and for Saturday evening, Dec. 23, Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, and Beethoven's first symphony will be played.

THE LISTENER.

The most important concern which Boston has had thus far this season has been its music. To say that the musical season has opened brilliantly is to make a very mild statement of the case. And the best part of it is that it promises to become better and better. So far as the Listener is able to get at the general sentiment, the patrons of the symphonies are greatly pleased with Mr. Paur. It was a severe requirement—to give satisfaction from the first moment, after Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Gericke. The new conductor must, of course, have the exactitude, the thoroughness, the steadfastness of ideal, the dissatisfaction with anything short of perfection which characterized Mr. Gericke, and the enthusiasm, the grace, the mobility, the poetry, of Mr. Nikisch. And yet, in the nature of things, Mr. Paur could not be both men, any more than the conductor who used to say to his orchestra on Friday afternoon, "Today I have read this symphony as you have just played it; tomorrow night I shall very likely read it quite differently," could also be the conductor whose orchestra showed not a hair's breadth of variation in the playing of a piece this month and the playing of the same piece next month. Between the two conductors there may be room for another who is as great a genius as either one. It is certainly not a disheartening circumstance to learn that Mr. Paur has his own reading of a symphony of Beethoven. We have got away from the notion that the musician is accursed who adds to or takes from the traditions in the matter of playing Beethoven by so much as a jot or a tittle.

+ + +

Mr. Paur has another difficulty to contend with, so far as his instant appreciation is concerned, in the common expectation which prevailed for a time that Mr. Richter was to succeed Mr. Nikisch. Some of our people had heard Mr. Richter conduct an orchestra in London, and they had brought home such extravagant accounts of the wonderful nature of the performances that unquestionably our symphony-goers were agog for something ineffable. Mr. Paur may be as good a conductor as Richter, but he had not, when he came, the fame which Richter has among Americans. But supposing that Mr. Paur is not as great a genius as Richter, is it likely that any large number of patrons of the symphony concerts could tell the difference between a piece conducted by Mr. Paur and one conducted by Mr. Richter, if they could not see the stage?

+ + +

ABOUT MUSIC.

Concerning the Foot as a Means of Beating the Time.

Should Not Earnest Conductors Wear Boots of Fur?

The Cause of Much Sentimentality in Church Music.

A most estimable acquaintance told me the other day that his pleasure at the Symphony Concerts was often disturbed by Mr. Paur. It seems that the new Conductor, a man of sincerity, one who puts his soul in the appointed task, is inclined to show openly his earnestness and zeal in the service of his employer by beating time lustily with his foot. As a result, the sitters in the front seats hear the creaking of the orchestral machine; and one of them, my friend, is likely to be a sitter in the seat of the scornful, for, just as he is prepared to dilate with the proper emotion,

"He hears a foot begin to stomp,
Thump! thump!
Thump! thump!
Like the spectre in 'Don Giovanni!'"

And yet nothing could more clearly show the honesty of Mr. Paur than this same beating the floor with a foot. It is not his fault if the players go astray. With his arms he cuts all manner of geometric figures in the air until he becomes a series of living diagrams; he is an atlas of conductorial charts; with his fingers he picks nuances off the orchestra; his face is constantly in action; and then there is his foot! Stolid and sodden must the musician be who can fail to understand the sign boards, admonitory, prohibitive, encouraging, that are thus set up before him.

Then, too, there is a simplicity about this manner of marking time that commends the man. Years ago in our choir lofts, perhaps even now in some, the man with the strongest voice beat time with the heaviest foot.

Mr. Paur would certainly be horrified if he knew that his habit disturbed anyone prepared to admire him. The habit, if unconscious, is probably confirmed. Now what shall be done?

When Mr. Nikisch was here great pains were taken for his comfort. He was exalted on high by the aid of platforms, and rugs of texture and design that suited his Oriental fancy did homage to his noble feet.

Why should not Mr. Paur be presented with a pair of thick fur boots with felt soles? With them might be given the subscription list of "patrons and patronesses of music;" and the list might be headed with the motto, "Sunter in modo," or "Do good by stealth." Rubber boots are cheaper; but they would chafe the conductor in his more impassioned moments; they yield an unsavory smell; they have a cold, wet noise of their own, even when they are perfectly dry.

Or there might be a return to a habit long ago in Italy, where the conductor beat time with a handkerchief.

Beating with the foot was a well-established practice years ago in many countries. Among the ancients the Corymbans wore sandals made heavy by wood or iron, and as he stamped he struck the hollow of his left hand with his right hand. Sometimes he clashed together shells. Before Lullu ruled in France, a roll of paper served as a baton.

It was Lullu, by the way, who struck his foot violently with the conductor's stick and died from the resulting wound—an awful warning to all magnetic and fiery leaders of orchestras. Lullu's stick is said to have been five feet long.

After Lullu, conductors used a thick piece of wood, and they hammered the desk with it. Grimm compared the conductor at the Opera to a wood-chopper. Rousseau claimed that without this noise the time could not be determined; "the ears are shocked," said Rousseau, "by this disagreeable and continuous noise, but the evil is inevitable." In this connection read the story by Berlioz, "Une victime du tact."

One of those learned men who apparently have nothing else to do save writing to the newspaper, which serves them as a "wastepipe to the intellect," claimed lately that the stick dated back only to the end of the 18th century. But in Dom Le Clerc's treatise on Plain Song, 1673, we find an allusion to the churches of the East and the West, in which the directors of the music employed a stick for the proper performance of the mass.

Deldevez, excellent musician and conductor of the Société des Concerts at the Paris Conservatory for at least a dozen years, believes that the ideal conductor should be a violinist and should direct with a fiddle-bow, not with a stick.

Choirmasters are even now at work in preparation of the Christmas music.

I understand that Mr. O'Shea's new mass will be sung at the Immaculate Conception. Mr. Kotli's mass will not be sung at St. James until Easter.

The choirmasters of Protestant churches should examine Mr. H. W. Parker's "The Holy Child," a cantata for Christmas tide. Many churches persist unfortunately in the use of a quartet without chorus; portions of this cantata will not therefore be available. But the "Cradle Hymn," a duet for soprano and tenor, will undoubtedly be heard Christmas and enjoyed by many congregations.

Much music appears yearly for the Christmas service, but how little of it is really worthy of serious attention. The English composers of to-day are apt to echo the Christmas music in "The Messiah," and when there is originality the anthems of the past five or six years are not equal in dignity or beauty to the music written by men of the last generation. The American composers are inclined to err in the direction of sentimentality. Then, here and in England, there is so much music composed for Christmas that seems perfunctory, around-out, manufactured, and paid for by the page.

In Unitarian churches the organists would apparently be restricted in the choice of texts. Yet, to their relief, more license is granted at Christmas, and words are then sung that refer directly to Trinitarian beliefs.

It is not to be denied that the story of the Incarnation, the Passion, and the Resurrection furnishes richer material to the composer of imagination than do the ethical teachings of modern philosophers and the abstract principles of morality. I merely state a fact. Glorious anthems with words taken from the Old Testament have been written; but the emotions of the hearer are stirred more deeply by a musical recital or description of the circumstances attending the birth or the death of the Holy One. The element of mysticism that must inevitably enter into such music is a most potent stimulant to the composer of fine or quick temperament.

142

I spoke a moment ago of sentimentality in music for Christmas. Sentimentality is the one great curse of nine-tenths of music written today for religious service in the Protestant churches of this country. The composers who write it and the choirmasters who choose it are not to be condemned ruthlessly; nor are the publishers largely at fault. The chief offender in the whole matter is the congregation. Religious music, as it is understood by many churchgoers, is something which they would describe as "sweet and soft." They would not admit that dramatic expression has any place in the choir loft. Joyful music that accentuates the exultation of a psalm of praise is to them a stumbling block. It disturbs their meditation on divine, or, possibly, worldly things. An unexpected harmonic progression, or a striking rhythmic device that italicizes some particular emotion of the hymn writer startles them, and they talk of the "operatic tastes of the choir," the "love of personal display shown by singers." When they are aroused to sarcasm, they say, "We are not educated up to that kind of music. Give us something we understand."

The choirmaster does not wish to lose his position. The publisher wishes to sell to the choirmaster. The composer must sell to the publisher. The ignorance, or the false, wretched, irreligious taste of a congregation is thus responsible for the musical crimes that are applauded only by those who instigate them. There are few choirmasters in the town who do not have cause to blush or laugh at the selections they are thus obliged to make.

There are churches of one Protestant denomination, the Episcopalian, where far better music is sung and appreciated. In the larger churches of this denomination the music is almost always dignified, and appropriate to the particular occasion.

Organists suffer in a similar fashion. Do they not often play pieces by the great masters of the organ solely for their own pleasure? Do they not find that an arrangement of some such familiar tune as, say, Braga's "Serenata" gives genuine satisfaction to the people down stairs, while the same people can see nothing in the exquisite slow movement from Salomé's sonata, and nothing in a moving choral setting by Bach?

I know of a church in this town where the organist was accused of a lack of religious feeling because on a festival occasion he played the B minor prelude and fugue of Sebastian Bach; and yet in that same church an arrangement or rather a disarrangement for quartet of a well-known operatic tune excited lively delight, although the music was suggestive necessarily of sensuous thoughts, recalling as it did to any opera-goer an amorous scene.

PHILIP HALE.

Echoes From the Eighth Symphony —Concerts and Entertainments Tonight—Musical Notes. Sche

The principal number on the program of last week's symphony concert was Rubinstein's dramatic symphony No. 4, given for the first time in this city. The peculiarities of the celebrated Russian composer and pianist are shown in his orchestral work. There is a wealth of melodic forms and suggestions running through the four movements, but the lack of development, either intentional or otherwise, is marked. Rubinstein, although one of the foremost pianists and composers of the day, is uneven in his work, a fact plainly evident to those who have heard him at the piano.

Moods govern him. At times he plays superbly and then he has spells of relapsing into carelessness. This contrast appears in his symphonic work. It is a beautiful composition, judged in its entirety, but marred by passages and orchestral treatment which are annoyingly inartistic when the abilities of the writer are considered.

The work opens with a familiar, moaning rhythm, frequently employed by Rubinstein, which leads up to a minor theme, introduced and developed by a strikingly curious orchestration for double basses and horns. New themes appear in the fantasia, at first lively, then of a military character, and after a strange bit of instrumentation the true fantasia really begins; and in this finale the genius of the composer is clearly shown. The dramatic climax is thrilling and worthy of his name and fame.

In the second and third movements a long scherzo and a dramatic ending of a majestic four-part harmony are excellent examples of contrasted writing of a high character. In the finale of the fourth movement occur several careless methods of working out thematic ideas which gives to the closing number the appearance of an unfinished composition.

Much of the orchestral work was very fine. The double basses gave the arpeggi in the first movement splendidly. The climax of the fantasia was forcefully and smoothly played. The cello and basses in the coda of the third movement, and the rondo in the finale were also worthy of special praise.

The symphony as a whole is interesting because it is a Rubinstein composition, but the excellences of the writing are somewhat overshadowed by the defects which appear throughout the work.

Schumann's great overture to "Manfred" was performed admirably, the beautiful deviations in the third part being notably delicate in shadings and crescendo variations. Brahms' variations on a theme by Haydn was the gem of the program, the excellent team work of the orchestra showing plainly in the numerous changes of tempo and treatments of the original motif. The precision of the men was marked and the brilliancy of the performance was appreciated by the auditors most heartily.

The next symphony concert will be given Dec 22. The program includes Beethoven's first symphony, a serenade by Mozart, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde."

MUSICAL MATTERS. adv.

The Symphony Concert.

The heaviness of the programme of Saturday's concert was in some degree counterbalanced by the excellence of the performance. Viewed from a technical standpoint, this was the best performance of the season, and Mr. Paur and his orchestra may well be proud of it. It began with Schumann's "Manfred" overture, which is perhaps the most even of all the orchestral compositions of this master. The subject seems to have appealed to Schumann's nature with especial force, and it was natural to expect that the composer who came nearest to the poetic ideal in the setting of "Faust" should also be very successful in so kindred a subject as "Manfred." Schumann was a veritable magician of rhythms, and always revelled in syncopations, and here these shifting of natural rhythm are peculiarly appropriate as picturing the distorted soul of the weird hero, and their contrast with the clear yet pathetic theme which represents Astarte is one of the most impressive of pictures. The shading of the close was most delicate, the contrasts were strongly brought out, and the trumpets were most effective in their soft passages. Altogether then, a notable performance.

But the interpretation of the Brahms variations of a Haydn theme went beyond even this standard. With many composers of the modern school orchestral variations mean a display of separate instruments; there is generally a flute variation, a chance for the bassoon, a bit of pyrotechnics for the violin, etc., etc. Brahms will have none of this; he goes back to the grander school of Beethoven for his model, and his variations not only have a true symphonic ring in their scoring but frequently cross the border-line between variation and development. To make this technical point more clear it may be explained that in variation the organic shape generally remains the same, in development it is usually altered; in variation it is the whole theme that is treated, in development its figures; in variation the composer merely redecorates the house in various ways, in development he builds entirely anew with the old material. The process in this case led to something quite different from the pretty villa which Haydn had built, but the rich tonal palace which Brahms made out of it was its own sufficient raison d'être. The orchestral combinations here were a study, and the clearness of the performance made the study an especially valuable one. The contrapuntal passages were marvellously clear-cut, and in every respect the performance was something to awaken enthusiasm.

The concert ended with Rubinstein's "Dramatic Symphony." It would not be a misnomer to entitle this work the "spasmodic symphony," for seldom has passion been torn into minuter tatters than in this work. It would be folly to deny that there are great moments in the composition, but there are also moments of dulness, much repetition, not of themes, but of ideas and of style, and the symphony is far too long for what it has to say. Rubinstein seems to be a musical Narcissus who takes leave of himself with great regret. He is also the most unequal of composers: at one moment he is scaling Olympus, and for the next half hour he is giving the auditor a geological survey of the route. The first movement is long enough for an entire symphony, and does not attain the grandeur of the immortal first movement of his "Ocean Symphony." There is plenty of combat in it, a good use of the strange Oriental scales, plenty of mystery, some touches of spectral horror on the chalumeau register of the clarinette (Weber has told some better ghost stories on this instrument in this deep register), but at the end one feels like echoing the question of Southey's young Peterkin—"Now tell us what 'twas all about?"

143

The performance was especially fine, beyond any that the work has yet received here. The horn, clarinette and oboe in the first movement, the crisp effect of the march-like theme of the second, the cellos in the theme of the adagio, the violin fury of the finale, the oboe in the adagio, and the brio of the figure which runs through the wood-wind from bassoon to flute near the close of the work, these were but a few of the excellent points of execution. The ensemble was without noticeable flaw, spite of the appropriately capricious tempi which the conductor employed. But while heartily congratulating the conductor and performers on the brilliant accomplishment of the arduous task, at the end one could not help wishing that if Rubinstein achieved Schubert's "heavenly length" he had also achieved his charming coherency.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC. Paul

The Eighth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert of last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred" Schumann
Variations on a theme of Haydn Brahms
Symphony No. 4, D minor Rubinstein

The overture to "Manfred" was played finely, with a full appreciation of its passion, beauty, despair. The variations by Brahms were read carefully, but the work was sandwiched injudiciously between the overture and the symphony. Mr. Paur has yet to prove that he is a master of the difficult art of arranging a program.

Rubinstein's "Dramatic" symphony has not been heard here for some time. The composer is fond of it. When he played the E flat major concerto of Beethoven in Berlin in November, 1883, he was asked by Wüellner, the conductor, which of his symphonies he would direct at the same concert, and he chose the fourth without hesitation. There is no denying the ingenuity or the power of certain passages of this work. The scherzo is captivating throughout. There is tender beauty in the slow movement, and alas! there is also sentimentality. But as an organic whole the symphony cannot be called consistently great. Too many people are introduced into the drama who have no connection with the development of the plot, and they take up a great deal of time with their chatter. There is a waste of ingenious elaboration in the instrumentation. Many of the figures of the wood-wind are ineffective against the strings, and endurance. Not only full strength is constantly demanded, but the ability to show this while executing very difficult passages at top speed, and the further capacity to enthuse and be authoritative. The playing was, however, almost always remarkable for accuracy, vigor, sonority and regard for form; and if an occasional phrase sounded a little weak, thin or reluctant or some small individual slip was noticeable, this certainly was not to be wondered at.

144

The concert began with a good reading of Schumann's "Manfred" overture, broad and smooth in the introduction, urgent and decided afterwards, with a moulding toward softness in the Astarte allusions. And, by the way, we could hardly help feeling that the beginning of the fourth movement in the symphony had for a few moments a temperament and form closely akin to the opening of this overture.

The intermediate number was Brahms's opus 56 A—the variations upon a serious, ecclesiastical theme by Haydn, known as the Chorale of St. Anthony. Variations are unquestionably caviar to the general, especially when, as in the present case, their connection with the nominal theme is so remote that the musician with score and pencil in hand can hardly find and follow it. But in this set Brahms has not confined himself to contrapuntal and figurative exercises. He has given his fancy free rein to choose keys, rhythms, tempi and orchestral combinations. So, with two or three dryer exceptions, these separate studies interest and almost divert by their varieties of movement and of tone color, until the finale comes to cap the climax with its martial swing, its keen accentuations and its lively orchestration brightened by the flurry of the piccolo and the jingle of the triangle. The whole got good playing and two or three of the variations were particularly brilliant, distinct and inspiring.

A delightful announcement is made for the next concert, which does not come until the 23d inst. Mr. Carl Baermann, whose long absence could be attributed to nothing but Mr. Nikisch's freakishness, is to be the soloist. His choice of music is not yet made known, but the programme includes Beethoven's first symphony; a serenade by Mozart, Mr. Kneisel giving the violin obbligato, and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture.

PHILIP HALE.

If to do is to be dramatic, then the Rubinstein symphony—No. 4, in D minor, opus 95—certainly deserves that title, which is indeed the one which it bears. For if ever an orchestra had to be up and doing for a good solid hour and the most of the time playing as if their lives depended upon the amount of sound they produced, this composition gives them the occasion. Nobody gets any let-up, except the three trombone players, who are kept in reserve for the last movement; but they, unless they were of wood or stone, could not get any real rest, backed up as they are by that merciless and judgmentless kettle-drummer, who has been coming out of late with more than his former muscularity. It is really time that he should be put into his place in relation to the rest of the band. The instruments of percussion are meant to emphasize only, not to overpower.

But there is a good deal more than noise and bustle in these exceedingly protracted movements. Indeed, if there were not, their vehemence, nervous excitement, clangor, hot haste and eager insistence, would wear out the hearer utterly long before the end was reached. But if there be power most to excess, there is also poetry and there is fancy as well as fury. One can interpret the symphony in detail as his notions rise under its influence; but, considered in a general way, it may suggest to many a scheme something like this: The first movement, with varying phrase and mood, might present the tense, hard, combative spirit of life, rising from ignorance and gloom to struggle with hand and head to accomplishment and independence; the second, life's comedy, ranging from the rude, heavy-footed mirth of clowns to quieter and less earthy gaiety; the third, a sense of possible repose and rest and gentle pleasure; the fourth, a recapitulation of the past experiences and states, concluding in the fulness of assurance and content. In the course of these expositions there are many passages wherein single instruments speak reflectively, beautifully, persuasively or pungently; but generally the mass of the orchestra is at work, and energetically if not always to the satisfaction of the professional examiner who looks for logic and for adherence to customary systems of development. The themes are many and often as graceful as they are original; there are odd shifts of rhythm and sudden, sharp syncopations, and one often seems to feel a kind of impatience on the composer's part that, with all his forces at work, he cannot get more out of them.

This symphony, which was placed judiciously at the end of the programme, was the hardest test of the season thus far of the orchestra's attention and endurance. Not only full strength is constantly demanded, but the ability to show this while executing very difficult passages at top speed, and the further capacity to enthuse and be authoritative. The playing was, however, almost always remarkable for accuracy, vigor, sonority and regard for form; and if an occasional phrase sounded a little weak, thin or reluctant or some small individual slip was noticeable, this certainly was not to be wondered at.

The concert began with a good reading of Schumann's "Manfred" overture, broad and smooth in the introduction, urgent and decided afterwards, with a moulding toward softness in the Astarte allusions. And, by the way, we could hardly help feeling that the beginning of the fourth movement in the symphony had for a few moments a temperament and form closely akin to the opening of this overture.

The intermediate number was Brahms's opus 56 A—the variations upon a serious, ecclesiastical theme by Haydn, known as the Chorale of St. Anthony. Variations are unquestionably caviar to the general, especially when, as in the present case, their connection with the nominal theme is so remote that the musician with score and pencil in hand can hardly find and follow it. But in this set Brahms has not confined himself to contrapuntal and figurative exercises. He has given his fancy free rein to choose keys, rhythms, tempi and orchestral combinations. So, with two or three dryer exceptions, these separate studies interest and almost divert by their varieties of movement and of tone color, until the finale comes to cap the climax with its martial swing, its keen accentuations and its lively orchestration brightened by the flurry of the piccolo and the jingle of the triangle. The whole got good playing and two or three of the variations were particularly brilliant, distinct and inspiring.

A delightful announcement is made for the next concert, which does not come until the 23d inst. Mr. Carl Baermann, whose long absence could be attributed to nothing but Mr. Nikisch's freakishness, is to be the soloist. His choice of music is not yet made known, but the programme includes Beethoven's first symphony; a serenade by Mozart, Mr. Kneisel giving the violin obbligato, and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C major, op. 21.

- I. Adagio.—Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante cantabile con moto.
- III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace.—Trio.
- IV. Finale: Adagio.—Allegro molto e vivace.

MOZART.

SERENADE No. 7, in D major, "Hoffner".

- I. Allegro maestoso.—Allegro molto.
 - II. Andante.
 - III. Menuetto.—Trio.
 - IV. Rondo: Allegro.
 - VIII. Adagio.—Allegro assai.
- Violin Obligato; MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major, op. 58.

- I. Allegro moderato.
 - II. Andante con moto.
 - III. Rondo: Vivace.
- Cadenzas by Mr. Baermann.

SCHUBERT.

OVERTURE to "Rosamunde." op. 26.

Soloist:

MR. CARL BAERMANN.

and at times they are unheard. Indeed, it may be said that this instrumentation appeals often more to the reader of the score than to the hearer of the instruments. At the same time there are many striking effects, as in the strange chromatic progression of clarionets and bassoons shortly after the beginning of the first allegro. The symphony is long enough to outlast a night in Russia. It is as long and as unequal as one of Dostoevsky's later novels. But with all its faults, and there are many, the claw of the lion is visible. The symphony, which swarms with technical difficulties, was played with spirit and, generally, with accuracy. Mr. Paor was inclined in the first movement to abuse freedom of tempo, when any instrument had a fugitive solo; but in the main his reading was eminently satisfactory.

There will be no concert this week. The program for the 23d will be Beethoven's First Symphony, Mozart's Serenade, Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture.

PHILIP HALE.

If to do is to be dramatic, then the Rubinstein symphony—No. 4, in D minor, opus 95—certainly deserves that title, which is indeed the one which it bears. For if ever an orchestra had to be up and doing for a good solid hour and the most of the time playing as if their lives depended upon the amount of sound they produced, this composition gives them the occasion. Nobody gets any let-up, except the three trombone players, who are kept in reserve for the last movement; but they, unless they were of wood or stone, could not get any real rest, backed up as they are by that merciless and judgmentless kettle drummer, who has been coming out of late with more than his former muscularity. It is really time that he should be put into his place in relation to the rest of the band. The instruments of percussion are meant to emphasize only, not to overpower.

But there is a good deal more than noise and bustle in these exceedingly protracted movements. Indeed, if there were not, their vehemence, nervous excitement, clangor, hot haste and eager insistence, would wear out the hearer utterly long before the end was reached. But if there be power almost to excess, there is also poetry and there is fancy as well as fury. One can interpret the symphony in detail as his notions rise under its influence; but, considered in a general way, it may suggest to many a scheme something like this: The first movement, with varying phrase and mood, might present the tense, hard, combative spirit of life, rising from ignorance and gloom to struggle with hand and head to accomplishment and independence; the second, life's comedy, ranging from the rude, heavy-footed mirth of clowns to quieter and less earthy gaiety; the third, a sense of possible repose and rest and gentle pleasure; the fourth, a recapitulation of the past experiences and states, concluding in the fulness of assurance and content. In the course of these expositions there are many passages wherein single instruments speak reflectively, beautifully, persuasively or pungently; but generally the mass of the orchestra is at work, and energetically if not always to the satisfaction of the professional examiner who looks for logic and for adherence to customary systems of development. The themes are many and often as graceful as they are original; there are odd shifts of rhythm and sudden, sharp syncopations, and one often seems to feel a kind of impatience on the composer's part that, with all his forces at work, he cannot get more out of them.

This symphony, which was placed judiciously at the end of the programme, was the hardest test of the season thus far of the orchestra's attention and endurance. Not only full strength is constantly demanded, but the ability to show this while executing very difficult passages at top speed, and the further capacity to enthuse and be authoritative. The playing was, however, almost always remarkable for accuracy, vigor, sonority and regard for form; and if an occasional phrase sounded a little weak, thin or reluctant or some small individual slip was noticeable, this certainly was not to be wondered at.

The concert began with a good reading of Schumann's "Manfred" overture, broad and smooth in the introduction, urgent and decided afterwards, with a moulding toward softness in the Astarte allusions. And, by the way, we could hardly help feeling that the beginning of the fourth movement in the symphony had for a few moments a temperament and form closely akin to the opening of this overture.

The intermediate number was Brahms's opus 56 A—the variations upon a serious, ecclesiastical theme by Haydn, known as the Chorale of St. Anthony. Variations are unquestionably caviar to the general, especially when, as in the present case, their connection with the nominal theme is so remote that the musician with score and pencil in hand can hardly find and follow it. But in this set Brahms has not confined himself to contrapuntal and figurative exercises. He has given his fancy free rein to choose keys, rhythms, tempi and orchestral combinations. So, with two or three dryer exceptions, these separate studies interest and almost divert by their varieties of movement and of tone color, until the finale comes to cap the climax with its martial swing, its keen accentuations and its lively orchestration brightened by the flurry of the piccolo and the jingle of the triangle. The whole got good playing and two or three of the variations were particularly brilliant, distinct and inspiring.

A delightful announcement is made for the next concert, which does not come until the 23d inst. Mr. Carl Baermann, whose long absence could be attributed to nothing but Mr. Nikisch's freakishness, is to be the soloist. His choice of music is not yet made known, but the programme includes Beethoven's first symphony; a serenade by Mozart, Mr. Kneisel giving the violin obbligato, and Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 23, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 1, in C major, op. 21.

- I. Adagio.—Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante cantabile con moto.
- III. Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace.—Trio.
- IV. Finale: Adagio.—Allegro molto e vivace.

MOZART.

SERENADE No. 7, in D major, "Hoffner".

- I. Allegro maestoso.—Allegro molto.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto.—Trio.
- IV. Rondo: Allegro.
- VIII. Adagio.—Allegro assai.

Violin Obligato; MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4, in G major, op. 58.

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Rondo: Vivace.

Cadenzas by Mr. Baermann.

SCHUBERT.

OVERTURE to "Rosamunde." op. 36.

Soloist:

MR. CARL BAERMANN.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the ninth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 1, in C major, Opus 21.

Mozart: Serenade No. 7, in D major ("Haffner").

(Violin obligato by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)

Beethoven: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, Opus 58.

(Cadenzas by Mr. Baermann.)

Schubert: Overture to "Rosamunde," Opus 26.

Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

A programme that made one think of the late John S. Dwight! A little over-long withal, but then so delightful. Beethoven's first symphony was admirably played. How Mozartish the work is in many points! The character of the themes, the construction, the very instrumentation, all recall Mozart, which is by no means common with Beethoven, by the way, for, if he in his earlier manner remind one of anybody else, it is generally of Haydn.

The five movements from Mozart's "Haffner" serenade—the whole work comprises eight—are full of beauty and were splendidly given. Mr. Kneisel's playing of the solo violin part, with occasional dainty cadenzas interpolated by himself (?) at just the right points, was simply exquisite. One might almost say that, for magical beauty of tone in double-stopping, he seeks his fellow. It was good to find the audience enjoying this music as they did; the public palate has not yet become so jaded by indulgence in "decadent" instrumentation and highly spiced harmonies that it cannot take delight in pure, natural, wholesome beauty.

Nine, not always short, movements already, and the whole great G major concerto still to come! It was almost too much of a good thing. Mr. Baermann played the wonderful work very beautifully indeed. At moments one felt a touch of nervousness in him, that prompted him to forge ahead, as if trying to leave the orchestra behind, but as a whole his playing was admirable in thorough soundness of conception and clearness of execution. In the poetic Andante con moto it rose to a very high pitch of expressive beauty. It is not often that one hears this greatest of all concertos so satisfyingly played. Mr. Baermann's cadenzas struck us as excellent at every point; brilliant without triviality, musically conceived and carried out; yet in no wise smelling of the lamp; in a word, just what cadenzas to a great classic work should be.

The over lovely "Rosamunde" overture brought the concert to a delightful close. It is not uninteresting to trace the influence of Rossini, for whom Schubert had at one time a sincere admiration, in this light, brilliant and taking overture. We doubt if many other instances can be found of a great German composer writing an overture in this easy-going and rather trivial Italian form—three themes developed at some length, with their subsidiaries, for a first part, and then repeated in another key for a third part, without any intervening working-out, and then a flashy coda to end off with! But for the absence of the Rossinian "crescendo" on the third theme—which, by the way, Beethoven had anticipated sixteen years before in his overture to "Leonore," No. 1—Rossini himself might have written it. It was capitally played.

That reminds me, even musicians neglect some branches of their education. Occasionally one of them is reminded, by making some awful break, that to be perfectly familiar with his chosen instrument is not all.

For example: One of the leading violinists in the Symphony Orchestra was lately engaged to play at the morning service at the fashionable high church by Boston's society leader, who takes a very practical interest in the music there. In the retirement of the organ gallery the violinist tuned his violin during the service, and, in the words of the song, "he'll never go there any more." Now if he had taken a course in the proper behavior of a musician at a church service that could not have happened.

Carl Baermann, the Symphony Soloist—Handel and Haydn Society —Varied Events Tonight.

The symphony concert program last night was attractive in many ways, and yet if it had not been for the Schubert "Rosamunde" overture, the last number of the evening, many of the listeners would have gone home rather tired than otherwise.

It is possible to have too much solid, substantial food just as it is to have too much of a light nature. The first three numbers on the program were long and absorbing. In order to appreciate them fully one had to listen with his ears wide open and watch with all his eyes.

This exercise kept up for almost two hours is exhausting, consequently it is safe to say that almost every person in the large audience was glad to hear the "Rosamunde" overture, for that can be understood and enjoyed without very close attention. As it was, people went home satisfied.

The program was made up of Beethoven's symphony No. 1 in C major, Mozart's serenade No. 7 in D major (Haffner), Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte No. 4 in G major, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" in C major. Mr. Baermann was the soloist, and Mr. Kneisel played the violin obligato in the Mozart serenade.

Mr. Baermann played the piano with his usual smoothness and general excellence of execution. The piano obligato, however, seemed too far away from the orchestral parts and occasionally the soloist and the other players seemed to be at a little variance in regard to time.

Mr. Kneisel played beautifully. The tone of his violin seemed even better than ever and he performed with a depth of feeling well suited to the character of the composition, which is pervaded with something akin to religious fervor.

The work of the orchestra as a whole was satisfactory, although precision in tempo was sometimes wanting. Mr. Paur conducted with great gusto and manly enthusiasm.

The program of this week's concert will be as follows: American symphony, MSS. Dvorak, first time in Boston; concerto for violin, Beethoven; overture, "1812," Tchaikowsky, first time; soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Carl Baermann.

The Christmas "Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn—Last Times of of "Venus"—The Return of Mar-teau—The Cadets in "Tobasco"—News and Gossp.

The annual appearance of Mr. Carl Baermann, the pianist, made the event of last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. Emil Paur. The programme was not a happy effort in this line, being singularly lacking in contrast and somewhat wearisome.

With the first of the Beethoven symphonies to begin with, followed by five movements of the "Haffner" serenade by Mozart, the pianoforte concerto No. 4, in G major, op. 58, by Beethoven, and Schubert's overture to "Rosamunde" as a finale, the list of works had little to stir the audience to enthusiasm, however much respect was felt for the several compositions.

Mr. Baermann's presence, however, largely atoned for any lack of interest in the several parts of the programme, and his entrance was made the occasion of a welcoming ovation which conclusively proved his continued popularity with the Symphony concert patrons. His performance of the great concerto, with his own cadenza, was what was to be expected from an artist of his sterling worth, and his thoroughly satisfying interpretation of its movements was recognized in the most complimentary manner. He has never been more successful in his appearance with the home orchestra, and his value in this yearly scheme of concerts has at no time been more pronounced.

A very delightful interpretation of the first, second, third, fourth and eighth movements of Mozart's "Haffner" serenade was given by Mr. Paur, the solos for the violin being charmingly played by Mr. Kneisel.

Mr. Paur's reading of the familiar first of the Beethoven symphonies was in keeping with the conservative tendencies he has shown since he assumed his position, and he was highly successful in bringing out all the manifold beauties of the work, free from exaggeration or excessive contrasts. The equally familiar "Rosamunde" overture made a pleasing ending to the evening's programme.

Mr. Paur will give an "up to date" character to his programme by bringing out the "From the New World" symphony by Dr. Dvorak next Saturday evening, when, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloist, the programme will also include the Beethoven violin concerto and Tchaikowsky's "1812" overture.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night, was, Symphony, No. 1, Beethoven; Serenade, No. 7 (Haffner), Mozart; Concerto for piano-forte, in G-major, Beethoven; and overture, "Rosamunde," Schubert. Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist. The concert was too long to be listened to without experiencing a sense of fatigue. It was not judiciously arranged, for before the concerto there were two long works, nine movements in all. The symphony was given with that minuteness of detail, in regard to making every possible point in it, which we have now learned to recognize as the weakness of Mr. Paur's conducting. The reading was pre-eminently conscientious; but it was too conscientious, and the result was that a work that is essentially genial in itself, and is peculiarly spontaneous in effect, seemed labored, owing to the excess of emphasis that was laid on it wherever opportunity served, in and out of season. Another consequence of so much elaboration was that the climaxes were anticipated, and when they arrived they were shorn of their impressiveness. The Mozart serenade was interpreted in a much better spirit, though even here there was a tendency to find something in the music that it did not say freely of itself, and its broad simplicity was often marred by this over-study in the direction of making it say more than is discoverable on its surface. Mozart, of all composers, is the one that bears a pedantic interpretation the least. However, this work has become somewhat passé, and could well have been spared. The re-appearance of Mr. Baermann at these concerts was welcomed with great heartiness, and his reception was of a warmth that must have been gratifying to him as an evidence of the affectionate esteem in which he is held. His performance of the concerto was an example of Beethoven playing at its very best, and after the long reign of sensational piano playing through which we have passed, it was a genuine pleasure to listen again to an artist of Mr. Baermann's solid and sterling qualities. In its delightful freshness, its thorough devotion to the composer, in its clearness as an interpretation, its clean-cut finish of technique, and its true musicianly qualities, it may justly be ranked as one of the most perfect and satisfying readings and performances of the work that has ever been heard here. It was a comfort to listen to such thoroughly honest and manly playing again as an antidote to the flood of sophisticated sentiment and affected femininity of style of which we have had so much of late. It met with the enthusiastic approval of the large audience, the artist being rewarded with tremendous outburst of applause after the first movement, and receiving three stormy recalls at the close. The programme for the next concert is: American Symphony, Dvorak; Concerto for Violin, Beethoven; Overture "1812," Tchaikowsky. Mr. Franz Kneisel is to be the soloist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

Although the programme of Saturday had some superb numbers, it was by no means well arranged, its length was abnormal, even with an excision from the printed list which made Saturday's concert considerably shorter than Friday's rehearsal, and before the soloist came upon the scene the audience had been fed even to tonal dyspepsia upon movement after movement, all in the same general vein—the early classical school. That with such a handicap Mr. Carl Baermann was able to win a great success proves his power in the most decided manner, but scarcely excuses the monotony of the first two thirds of the programme.

Beethoven's first symphony began the concert. It is the weakest sister of the nine, but it shows that Beethoven began where Haydn ended. Had Beethoven died at the age that Schubert did, this symphony would have been the chief indication of his genius, and the biographers would have classed him as a worthy exponent of the Haydn school. Schubert's C major symphony, written at about the same age that Beethoven was at this epoch, stands much higher, and it is one of the "ifs" of musical history whether Schubert might not have gone beyond the Beethoven heights had he lived longer. But even in this work one can perceive the giant tugging at his chain and striving to break his fetters; this is notably the case in the third movement, for here Beethoven achieved a minuet that Haydn would not have attained in a century. Nothing seems so typical of Haydn as the graceful and melodious minuets which he wrote in such profusion, and nothing shows the sturdy Beethoven more clearly than the manner in which he at once tried to give ruggedness and virility to this form; there is more of the spirit of the Scherzo in this movement than in any other minuet ever written, more even than in the first symphonic Scherzo which came in Beethoven's next symphony. To the present writer this movement is the gem of the symphony, and Mr. Paur read it with just the right spirit and dash. The finale drops back into the exact vein of Haydn, and the light rollicking style reminds one of the fact that the ending of the Suite (the Gigue) had a decided influence upon the conclusion of the early symphonies. It was played in a clear and definite manner, and the toying with the tempo of the fragmentary scale-work of its introduction was not ineffective. Time was when German conductors ridiculed this short prelude and some even omitted it altogether.

The Mozart Serenade, even in a twice abbreviated state, was de trop. It only repeated the style of what had been presented in the preceding symphony. It gave Mr. Kneisel a chance to do some commendably pure violin work, showed an excellent dialogue between violins and horn, and ended with some most brilliant passages for the violins, a sort of perpetuum mobile.

Now followed the real Beethoven, and a real Beethoven player, too. From the very beginning Mr. Carl Baermann was in his element in this work, a concerto which is not a whit inferior to, although so different from, the "Emperor," which succeeded it. The performance was dignified and manly, capricious enough to give the subtle changes of expression, but far removed from trickiness or sensationalism. The cadenza of the first movement, composed by the pianist, although somewhat long for the continuity of the work, was a fine development of preceding matter and never became irrelevant. In the last movement Mr. Baermann obeyed the composer's injunction ("La cadenza sia corta") and gave a brief but brilliant display of virtuosity. Spite of the fact that the audience had listened to almost an entire concert before this work, they were aroused to a pitch of enthusiasm and recall followed recall in a most spontaneous outburst of approbation.

The melodic Schubert closed the concert with that strange compound of blood and thunder, of heavy brasses and tender song-themes,—the overture to "Rosamunde." This was splendidly performed, and its strong contrasts were made without the slightest lapse from perfect ensemble. The irreverent auditor could not be impressed with the fact that one of the most important themes was first cousin to "Way down upon the Suwannee River," but that only showed that folksong has a kinship all the world over, and that Foster's work is to be classed with the genuine inspirations in this school. Next Saturday we shall have an entire symphony founded upon such cis-Atlantic themes, for Dvorak's new work, idealizing our typical music, is to receive its first performance in Boston.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC.

The Ninth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening was as follows:

Symphony, No. 1.....Beethoven
Serenade, No. 7, ("Haffner").....Mozart
Concerto for piano, G major.....Beethoven
Overture, "Rosamunde".....Schubert

Once on a time there lived in Salzburg a man named Sigmund Hafner. He was a wholesale merchant and a burgomaster. He was fond of music, and when there were festivals in his house he summoned the musicians of the town. This "worthy and public-spirited" citizen had a daughter, known as Elisabeth, who, after the manner of her sex, fell in love, and with a certain Mr. Spaeth.

In Germany a betrothment is a serious matter, as fickle-minded Americans have found to their surprise and cost. Some say that for the betrothment of Miss Hafner, the great Mozart wrote the serenade played here last evening. Others say that the serenade was composed for the joyous celebration of her marriage. For a later festal gathering in the house of Hafner, Mozart wrote a symphony in D major, a work well worth hearing to-day.

Now the word serenade in Mozart's time was loosely applied to evening music. The lover who sang beneath a balcony and turned about only to see the pale face of a rival with drawn sword or dagger sang a serenade. Serenades were played or sung on Venetian canals. Serenades accompanied the clinking of glasses and the low laughter of coquettes. Serenades tickled the vanity of illustrious visitors, whose fine plumage glittered in the light of torches. And Elisabeth Hafner looked at her lover and pondered her fate while the musicians played the serenade of Mozart.

150

There are eight movements in this particular serenade; and they were not all played last evening. The first allegro might have given the pitch to rejoicing, or to the play of knife and fork. The andante with the charming violin obbligato, was for tenderer moments, moments of confidences, vows and promises. And the other numbers were for merriment and pledging of toasts.

It is delightful music, this serenade of Mozart: old fashioned, quaint, at times formal, at times full of a gracious and courtly tenderness unknown in the days of nervous depression or exaltation. And it was played by orchestra and Mr. Kneisel delightfully.

There are some who only recognize in Beethoven, the strange giant of the mysterious latter musical years. They look askew at the young Beethoven. They do not find the lion. But it is a pleasure to see the cub at play.

In the first Symphony of Beethoven, there is no marked departure from the symphony of the time. Perhaps in the minuetto there are suggestions of the future scherzo; but there is nothing revolutionary in the symphony. There are the voices of Haydn and of Mozart; but although we recognize them—see, for instance, how Figaro enters in the finale—they somehow speak with an accent that seems a little foreign.

But the Beethoven of the G major concerto is another man. In the concerto there is but one voice, and that is the voice of Beethoven.

Mr. Carl Baermann gave an admirable performance of the solo part. It was pure, without exaggeration, without caprice, without the slightest symptom of the feverish desire for personal display. The concerto, with Mr. Baermann at the piano, was a homogeneous work. There was no apparent rivalry between orchestra and piano. The hearer thought of Beethoven, and not of the pianist, and, after all, this is the highest praise. But after the last chord sounded through the hall there was spontaneous and grateful thought of the pianist who had assisted so artistically in giving unalloyed pleasure, and he was applauded most heartily.

Such concerts as that of last evening are not only a musical delight; they are a liberal education. It is well, it is indeed necessary that modern works of every school and nationality should receive prompt and due attention. But it is also well to escape from the hot air of the modern palace of art, and meditate calmly and serenely in the temple of the ancient masters. There were brave men before Agamemnon. There were great composers before Brahms and Wagner.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Ninth Symphony Concert. Handel and Haydn.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Symphony No. 1.....Beethoven
Serenade, No. 7 (Haffner).....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major.....Beethoven
Overture, Rosamund.....Schubert
Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist.

It can be seen at a glance what a fatiguing demand this programme made upon the attention of the listener, both as regards its length and the monotony of its material. The Beethoven symphony, in its author's first period, reminds one constantly of the immortal Mozart, and it was unnecessary to play the five movements of the Mozart Serenade immediately following in order to impress this characteristic similarity upon the audience. Neither is the "Serenade" a work of sufficient importance to warrant putting it upon such a programme. It of course is charming in its simplicity, and would, if properly contrasted, be of educational value to the student in the classics of orchestral writing.

Then came the concerto of Beethoven, a specimen of the author's advanced period, replete with the unrivalled genius of its immortal composer. If Mr. Paur sought to display the first and last period of the great master's composition, the symphony and the concerto would have served well in accomplishing his desire. If he wished to make plain how much the symphony resembled Mozart and also how far removed from the characteristics of his eminent predecessor was the music of Beethoven's concerto, then again Mr. Paur was successful in the framing of his programme.

But in these days it is unnecessary to dwell so practically in an exposition of such historical facts, of which the student, even, is well aware through the ample means at his disposal, in the piano arrangements of the works of both these classic composers.

Neither is it necessary that Mr. Paur should demonstrate these facts with his orchestra, an organization whose function should be more than that of an adjunct in a conservatory course of education.

If it was not for the reasons given that the audience was dosed with monotony of the first and second numbers on the programme, then it would seem as if the ability of Mr. Paur to arrange programmes successfully must be doubted. To the connoisseur, nothing could be more stupid than this programme of Saturday evening. In the days of the Harvard orchestra, 25 years ago, it would have dragged on the attention of its audience.

As far as the performance of these works was concerned, it is gratifying to say, that the orchestra has not, since Mr. Gericke retired, played with so much expression and precision, with so much regard for the dynamic demands of the score and with so little roughness as on this occasion. The firm and earnest endeavors of Mr. Paur brought out the characteristics of each work to a great degree and it only needed a little more freedom in the swing of the playing and a more acute definition in the matter of tone gradation to have made the playing extremely excellent.

151

The passages for violin solo in the Mozart piece were played by Mr. Kneisel in his usual highly finished and artistic manner.

The event of the evening was the reappearance in these concerts of Mr. Carl Baermann, the eminent pianist of this city. It is as long ago as the first year that Nikisch enumerated the conductor's position since Mr. Baermann has appeared in any programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Not since the playing of the Beethoven concerto in G by the renowned Anton Rubinstein in 1872 has such a highly artistic and eminently noble rendering of this work been heard in our concerts as was vouchsafed by Mr. Baermann on this occasion. Mr. Baermann is justly celebrated for his remarkably fine interpretation of this great master, but in every respect he surpassed all former efforts in the masterly manner in which he brought forth the beauties of this marvellous composition. It was gratifying to observe this fine musician and accomplished performer devoid of all affectation and engrossed only in a true and conscientious revelation of the composer's genius, and we must thank Mr. Paur for his selection of such a genuine artist.

There was an evident sympathy between the performer and the conductor as regards a conception of the composer's intentions, and it is seldom that so complete a unit is experienced as existed between the soloist and the accompaniment. Mr. Paur deserves great praise for the skilful manner in which he conducted the accompaniment.

Next Saturday evening, Dvorak's latest orchestral work just produced for the first time at a Philharmonic concert in New York will be given in Boston for the first time. It is entitled "American Symphony." The overture "1812" by Tschalkowsky will also be played for the first time at these concerts. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist, and he will be heard in the concerto for violin by Beethoven. This will be a programme of great interest.

The eminent feature of the ninth Symphony concert was Mr. Carl Baermann's re-entrance after an absence of several seasons. Mr. Paur had provided a preposterously long programme, and more than an hour had been occupied with Beethoven's first symphony and five selected movements from Mozart's seventh serenade for orchestra, before Mr. Baermann's number—which was Beethoven's G major concerto—was reached. But the audience had been waiting too many years for that fine artist's reappearance to begrudge now a trifling half hour or so of unnecessary delay, and it is safe to say that no person left the hall before the conclusion of the concerto whom some exigency like an early-departing train did not summon away. Mr. Baermann could not but feel flattered at the great cordiality of his reception, the attentive interest with which he was followed and the earnest applause which called and recalled him when his task was done. A truly catholic musician, a student of far wider range than that of his own profession, and a pianist who comprehends and illustrates many schools, Mr. Baermann is especially delightful, strong and authoritative in the classics. His limpid style and his elegant simplicity become the unaffected beauty and delicate detail of Mozart, while he has also the geniality, the humor and the emotional sensitiveness without which the best executant can give only the form of Beethoven without his spirit. His reading of this great concerto, which dates from that productive period when its author was preparing the fifth symphony and Fidelio, was at all points noble, true and sympathetic. The busy energy of the first movement, the quiet melancholy of the second and the buoyant vitality of the third, were expressed in turn with lucidity of phrasing, ample technical resource and variety and with sensitive feeling. The cadenzas were of Mr. Baermann's writing—the first of their kind which he has given to Boston—and admirably adapted to their places. Sufficiently elaborate and difficult to satisfy that expectancy which the professional man no less than the dilettante encourages in himself at such points, they were not written to display tours de force, but to develop ideas, and their consonancy with the movements into which they were incorporated was at once apparent. The orchestra took both pains and pleasure in supporting the piano, and Mr. Paur directed them with elastic conformity to Mr. Baermann's intention and interpretation.

152

The reading of the symphony was easy, bright and charming, rarely modified from a steady tempo into any moulding of individual bars, and there was clear portrayal of the dawning tendencies which the master was soon to heighten into the most resplendent noon which has ever illuminated and warmed the world of music. The Mozart movements, which should not have been intruded into a programme necessarily long otherwise, were enjoyed upon the whole, although many persons were trying to save themselves for the event of the evening. They are of diverse natures and the choice made of them was favorable to contrast and relief, but some (especially the andante) are protracted and would sound best to fresh ears. Four of the five had either an obbligato or a cadenza for a solo violin—some, indeed, had both. These passages, often almost co-extensive with the movements themselves, were beautifully played by Mr. Kneisel, who was much applauded therefor. A commendable reading of Schubert's "Rosamunde" overture ended the programme.

For the next concert two novelties are announced—Dvorak's "American" symphony, which has just been heard with favor in New York and Tchaikowsky's "1812" overture. Between these Mr. Kneisel will play from Beethoven a violin concerto.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

153

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

DVOŘÁK.

SYMPHONY No. 8, in E minor, "Z nového světa," op. 95. (MS.)

- I. Adagio.—Allegro molto.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Scherzo: Molto vivace.—Trio.
- IV. Allegro con fuoco.

BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, in D major, op. 61.

- I. Allegro, ma non troppo.
 - II. Larghetto;
 - III. Rondo.
- Cadenzas by JOACHIM.

TSCHAIKOWSKY.

OUVERTURE SOLENNELLE, "1812." (Der heilige Krieg), op. 49.

Soloist:

MR. FRANZ KNEISEL.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

[See Page Six.]

Trans:

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the tenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Dvorák: Symphony No. 8, in E minor, "From the New World," Opus 95 (MS.)

Beethoven: Concerto for violin, in D major, Opus 61. (Cadenzas by Joachim.)

Tschaikowsky: Overture, "1812," in E-flat major, Opus 49.

Mr. Franz Kniesel was the violinist.

The new Dvorák symphony has already made no little noise in the world. Not very long ago the following announcement appeared in, we now forget what paper:

It appears that Dr. Antonín Dvorák, the famous Bohemian composer, has reached the conclusion that the future music of America must be founded upon what are called the Negro melodies, and that these must be the basis of any serious and original school of composition to be developed in the United States. He says that these are the folk-songs of America, and that all great musicians borrow from the songs of the common people. He further states that in the Negro melodies he discovers all that is needed for a great and noble school of music.

In this symphony Dr. Dvorák has taken a pioneer step in the direction indicated in the above quotation; a great deal of the thematic material of the work is either taken directly from negro music, or written in clever imitation thereof. Before considering the symphony itself,—which a single hearing gives but little opportunity for doing to much purpose,—let us first consider the general principle Dr. Dvorák has been anxious to establish in regard to an American school of composition. Certainly the question is an interesting one.

That all schools of composition whatsoever are to be recognized as the result of a process of evolution from one or the other of two primordial musical facts, hardly anyone will be inclined to deny today, for it is generally established as true. These primordial musical facts are the old, ritual Ambrosian or Gregorian chaunt, and the popular folk-song. Leaving the old church chaunt out of the discussion, as not touching the case in hand, we have the folk-song (which includes what might be called the folk-dance) as the germ from which by far the greater part of modern music, especially instrumental music, has been evolved. And judging from experience and by analogy, it seems more than probable that, if any specially characteristic and individual school of composition is to grow up in a country which does not as yet possess one, it must be evolved in the same way from a similar germ. With this principle itself we cannot quarrel, for it seems inevitable. But let us see for a moment, looking at the matter equally from the point of view of experience and analogy, what its practical application seems likely to involve.

Let us not go too far back in the history of the art of music; it will be enough to consider modern schools of composition, going at most no farther back than Haydn's and Mozart's day. Germany and perhaps not quite so far in other countries. We can count today about six different schools of composition, each one of which can lay just claim to possessing certain sharply marked national characteristics: the German, Italian, French, Magyar, Slavic and Scandinavian schools. If anyone miss the English or Anglo-Saxon school from this list, let its absence be explained by the fact that England and the Anglo-Saxon race in general have not as yet done anything in the higher and more developed musical forms in which any specially national or racial traits are to be recognized; the English school, if such school there be, has in no wise differentiated itself from the rest of the world. Again, if anyone is inclined to subdivide the Slavic school into the Russian, Polish and Czech, he is quite at liberty to do so; but these three sub-schools present marks of affinity amply sufficient to make it fair to lump them together under the general head of Slavic.

Now, in studying these six schools, as they are represented in modern music, we can hardly avoid taking one step further in classification, based on certain distinctive characteristics in the use made of "national" material by each of them, and in this very "national" material itself. From this point of view, we find these six schools fall naturally into one or the other of two larger and more comprehensive classes, or orders; the German, Italian, and Magyar, French into one; the Slavic, and Scandinavian into the other. Let this larger classification of ours not be misunderstood. No doubt there are certain points in which the present Slavic and Scandinavian schools exhibit a stronger affinity with the German than either the Italian or French does; but this does not affect our classification one whit; it is based on quite a different principle. We base it principally on a certain marked difference in character to be described in the "national" or "folk-song" material of which the music of these several schools is respectively built up.

Comparing the general run of German, French and Italian folk-songs, on the one hand, with the generality of Slavic, and Scandinavian folk-songs, on the other, we find that the former belong in one respect to a different class from the latter. The general melodic and rhythmic character of the German, Italian and French songs stamps them as examples of a higher stage in musical evolution. They are for the most part based on the modern tonal (major or minor) scales, which scales represent in themselves a higher stage of evolution than the old Church modes or the incomplete, quasi-barbaric scales on which much of the Slavic and Scandinavian folk-music is based. Be it remembered also that the whole development of modern harmony is inseparably connected with the evolution of the modern tonal scales; and that all melodies based on "barbaric" scales prove to be in the end rather recalcitrant subjects for harmonizing. In harmonizing such melodies, one must either employ normal, tonal harmony, which effaces much of their specific character, or else have recourse to a sort of abnormal, more or less barbarous harmony, which only gives additional prominence to what was already barbaric and rude in the melodies themselves. The folk-song raw material on which German, French and Italian music is based was, in a sense, already "civilized" in itself; the folk-song material on which characteristically Slavic and Scandinavian music is based was and is essentially of a more or less barbaric quality, and thus less amenable to "civilized" treatment.

150

No doubt many German composers, notably Beethoven, have often taken such "outlandish" themes for musical treatment; but notice that Beethoven in almost every case so treated them that they lost almost all of their native "outlandish" flavor; that he "civilized" them, so to speak, before using them. The Russian themes he used at times do not sound in the least characteristically Russian, as he uses them. Now, it is hopeless to found a characteristic national school of composition on characteristic national folk-songs, if the whole distinctively characteristic flavor of such songs is to be eliminated in the process of musical development; the school can be recognizable as distinctively national and characteristic only in so far as it preserves the special flavor of the material it works with. And if this material is barbaric, the music made from it must be to a greater or less extent barbaric too.

And this is just what we find nowadays in the higher forms of Russian, Czech, or Scandinavian music, in the works of men like Tschaiowsky, Rimski-Korsakoff, Smetana, Dvorák, Grieg and Svendsen. In so far as it is characteristically Slavic or Scandinavian, in so far as it preserves its specifically "national" flavor, it is essentially barbaric and outlandish. You may talk as much as you please about its strongly marked character, piquancy, zest and "melancholy expression." One may reply—as we do most heartily—that its piquancy and zest are in nine cases out of ten sheer musical ugliness, its strongly marked character that of stunted and half-developed musical growth, and that "tender melancholy" is but a poetic-sounding name which the morbidly inclined are fond of applying to what the more healthy and eupeptic among us prosaically call "blue devils." To our mind, the great bane of the present Slavic and Scandinavian schools is and has been the attempt to make civilized music by civilized methods out of essentially barbaric material. The result has in general been a more apotheosis of ugliness, distorted forms, and barbarous expression. We gladly admit exceptions; but this seems to us to be the general rule.

And, to arrive at last at our point, our American Negro music has every element of barbarism to be found in the Slavic or Scandinavian folk-songs; it is essentially barbarous music. What is more, it sounds terribly like any other barbarous music. If no one had known that Dr. Dvorák's symphony last Saturday evening was based on Negro material, we think that every man jack of us would have swallowed it unhesitatingly as characteristically Czech. Upon the whole, few of us are at all familiar with Negro music; perhaps the Negro melodies ought to be our folk-songs, but the uncomfortable fact is that they are not; they sound as strange and unaccustomed in our ears as the Czech or Russian melodies do; our intimate musical associations lie elsewhere. How many people in the Music Hall, think you, thought the Dvorák symphony "sounded like home"? Very few, we imagine!

It has been objected that all the music of the higher sort hitherto written in America has been but a reflection of Leipzig, Munich or Paris. This is true enough. But what if we start fresh on a negro basis, according to Dr. Dvorák's plan? Is this basis really original and individual enough to prevent our music seeming like a mere reflection of Moscow and Prag? Of the two alternatives we prefer the former. If we are to have a mere copy in either case, let us at least have a copy of a civilized model! To our mind this whole "negro" scheme seems terribly like going wilfully out of the way in search of originality; and the pursuit of originality is very like what the philosophers tell us the pursuit of happiness is: a hunt in which the fox is never killed.

Of Dr. Dvorák's symphony itself we could form no very definite idea; the first movement was interesting in its development, and to a certain extent pleasing, at a first hearing; but we should much like to hear the work once or twice again before saying anything of the rest of it.

Tschaiowsky's "1812" created more furor than we have seen in the Music Hall for a great while; it was literally cheered to the echo. It is a work which, in spite of its outrageousness—perhaps because of it—takes hold of you strongly and irresistibly. We hardly believe that so much noise was ever heard in the Music Hall before; before this overture the united German bands sink into insignificance, and Wagner's overture to "Rienzi" seems a mere bit of muted-string "Träumerei." And we did not have quite the whole of the score, either; the two insignificant items of a whole brass band and a park of artillery were omitted. But what was left was loud enough. The work is immensely exciting and stirring, and does not owe this quality to its volume of tone merely; it is recognizably in the symphonic form and worked out with a very sure hand; its themes, one and all, are rather insignificant in themselves, but they tell for what they were meant to. Since the B-flat minor pianoforte concerto we have heard nothing by Tschaiowsky we have liked so much.

Mr. Kneisel played the great Beethoven concerto simply gloriously. Saving that the final rondo might have gone with a little more dash and force of accent, we cannot see how his rendering of the great work could have been improved. It was great playing at every point.

The next programme is made up wholly of works by Richard Wagner and is as follows: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"; prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde," Siegfried-Idyll, "Eine Faust-Ouvertüre," last scene from "Götterdämmerung." Mme. Amalia Materna will be the singer.

MUSIC. Journal

The Tenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 5, E minor (MSS).....Dvorak
Concerto for violin.....Beethoven
Overture "1812".....Tschaiowsky

The question is not: Where did Dvorak find the thematic material for this new symphony?

The question is this: What did Dvorak do with the material after he found or invented it?

It is immaterial whether this symphony "From the New World" is American, Bohemian or Celtic. The question is this: Is the music good or bad?

Dvorak has here written a pleasing work, a work that abounds in melody, that shows the ingenuity of the trained musician, that is brilliant in color. It is a work that will undoubtedly be popular, and deservedly popular.

He has succeeded in the main task and he has thus won glory enough.

But what is all this wild talk about the invention at last of "American" music?

Here is an excellent Bohemian composer. He is imported by the patroness of a music school, and at considerable expense. His dwelling in our country is undoubtedly, in a certain sense, an honor to us. He suddenly makes the discovery that "American" music must be built on negro and Indian airs. He writes this symphony to prove his theory and found "American" music.

But let us ask a few questions. If this symphony were played without any advance and explanatory notice in any European city, would a German, or Italian, or Russian, or Scot, or Frenchman say at once, "Why, this is American music!"

Would he not find any and all music but American?

Would he not find Scandinavian hints, Hungarian rhythm, Bohemian thought, Scotch melody; would he not find tributes to all nations; would he not admire the workmanship and leave the concert hall without a thought of negro, Indian or native born white citizen of the United States?

The rhythm of the first phrase of the first movement is partly suggestive of the Southern steamboat and the plantation; but the rhythm is also partly European. The larghetto is full of Scotch and Scandinavian suggestion. The scherzo is anything you please; but, this may be said, as an exhibition of American characteristics real or alleged, "as a musical exhibition of dash, "smartness," lack of reverence, and general devil-me-care, it is not to be named in the same breath with Mr. Chadwick's symphonic scherzo. As for the finale, that, too, is what you will: there is a hint at "Yankee Doodle," but the temporary use of a transplanted tune does not make an "American" symphony.

Nor can you expect a Bohemian composer to throw off suddenly his nationality and forget it when he writes.

But there is much that is beautiful in this same symphony. First of all, it is cheerful and agreeable music. There is no touch of pessimism. There is no struggle with the Infinite. The composer has the simple faith of a healthy child. There is the spirit of Nature. There is a thought of woods and fields. Simple and pleasing thoughts are expressed intelligibly. At times the thoughts are clad gorgeously in instrumental colors; but the beauty of the thoughts does not suffer thereby, nor is it puffed up or distorted. After one hearing, the slow movement seems to me the gem of the work.

The overture of Tschaiowsky abounds in "alarms within and without." The plaintive church hymn is at first frightened by the triumphant Marseillaise, but the French conquer only for a moment. Cossacks scour the plain. There is the Russian General with the terrible name. There is the fire; there is the snow. The Marseillaise is heard no more. There is the exultation of a delivered nation. Such music as this overture of Tschaiowsky is perhaps panoramic, or even cycloramic. It would not do as a weekly dose. But it is a good thing to hear such music once in a while, to have the pulse stirred, to feel the consciousness of the raging animal that is in the body of even the most smug and exemplary citizen, although he may not know it.

Mr. Kneisel played his part in the concerto by Beethoven with infinite care and taste. The fine characteristics of his performance have always received full praise in this city. While it is only justice to this admirable violinist to praise, at length, his accuracy, his usually faultless intonation, his elegance and general finish, it may also be said that his temperament is such that he does not appear to complete advantage in such a work as the Beethoven concerto, which demands a player of more heroic mold.

The playing of the orchestra was excellent. Mr. Faur conducted with authority, sympathy and skill. The program was too long. The second and third movements, or at least the third movement of the concerto, might well have been omitted.

PHILIP HALE.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Hunting Expedition of Antonin Dvorak.

How He Went A-Gunning After Genuine American Music.

What Certain People Think of His Musical Game Bag.

Inasmuch as Mr. Dvorak's symphony "From the New World" is considered by some as "an historical event," let us look at its origin.

According to the New York Herald, it was Mr. Thurber's "fixed plan to persuade the composer to attempt a bold exploration into the musical material of America and lay the foundations for a national school of composition.

For this exploration and for incidental services as Director of the National Conservatory of 158

Thurber agreed to pay Mr. Dvorak $15,000 a year.

And what did Mr. Dvorak do?

According to the New York Herald, the said Mr. Dvorak began to study native music after his arrival in New York. Unfortunately for the future historian, we are not told how he studied it, or whether he disguised himself in his exploration so that the music would not become suspicious, frightened, and then escape. It would be a pleasure to read of his wanderings in the jungles of the Bowery and in the deserts of Central Park. It would be interesting to know precisely his first thought on seeing the Harlem goat, an animal now rare. The composer is a modest man, and he has not even hinted at his perilous trips on the elevated railway or the Belt Line.

But what a book he could write! For, according to the New York Herald, "there is no more impressionable man in the world than Dvorak. His moods vary with the hours. He is as sensitive as a child. His imagination will take fire instantly. He absorbs color, form, sentiment, everything from his surroundings."

At the end of his first year in America the intrepid explorer determined to visit Spillville, Ia., not for the purpose of treeing or shooting national music. He wished to take a vacation in this Bohemian village. Besides, he had made up his mind; he had bagged his game. Just before his departure he gave his conclusions to the New York Herald. These conclusions were as follows:

"I am now satisfied," he said, "that the future music of this country must be founded upon what are called the negro melodies. This can be the foundation of a serious and original school of composition to be developed in the United States. When I first came here I was impressed with this idea, and it has developed into a settled conviction. These beautiful and varied themes are the product of the soil. They are American. They are the folk songs of America, and your composers must turn to them. All of the great musicians have borrowed from the songs of the common people. Beethoven's most charming scherzo is based upon what might now be considered a skillfully handled negro melody. I have myself gone to the simple, half forgotten tunes of the Bohemian peasants for hints in my serious work. Only in this way can a musician express the true sentiment of a people. He gets into touch with the common humanity of the country. In the negro melodies of America I discover all that is needed for a great and noble school of music. They are pathetic, tender, passionate, melancholy, solemn, religious, bold, merry, gay, gracious, or what you will. It is music that suits itself to any mood or any purpose. There is nothing in the whole range of composition that cannot find a thematic source here."

Now, strange to relate, the American composer did not cut out at once this Dvorakian paragraph and paste it in his hat. As a rule, he was inclined to contradict the eminent Bohemian. There was pother for a time. The views of celebrated Europeans who knew little or nothing about America were cabled over at considerable expense and read at length by the idle of cultivated taste.

Then Mr. Dvorak went to work on his opus 95. He first took the precaution of announcing, and it was in the New York Herald, that he would write a symphony based upon American negro and Indian melodies "to prove that his position was sound and sincere."

Mr. Krehbiel states that this symphony, the fifth, was written in New York last spring, but revised and probably completed in its orchestration in the course of the composer's summer vacation, which he spent in Spillville, Ia.

The symphony was first played at the second public rehearsal and second concert of the Philharmonic Society, New York, Dec. 15 and 16, under the direction of Mr. Seidl.

It is of interest to note that the title on the manuscript of this American Symphony is in Bohemian.

This American Symphony is conducted in Boston by a German, who speaks little or no English.

And how many men in the orchestra that plays here this American Symphony were born in this country?

It will be observed that the folk-songs of America are, according to Mr. Dvorak, peculiar to either the negro or the Indian. The American, as an American, has no national music, no folk-song.

Why should not this symphony then be called "The Negro-Indian Symphony," if it must have a special name.

Mr. Krehbiel is now inclined to believe that at last we really have a great national piece of music. In an interesting article, published lately in the New York Tribune, he reviewed the symphony from the standpoint of nationality, and, although he finds many things in the symphony, he finds also large quantities of Americanism.

But hold. How does Mr. Krehbiel deal with the fact that the American, in the modern sense of the word, is without folk-song? Hear him:

"He (Dvorak) recognized, too, what his critics forgot, that that music is entitled to be characteristic of a people which gives the greatest pleasure to the largest fraction of a people."

By this process of reasoning either Irish or German folk-song might be called properly the characteristic music of the city of New York.

Mr. Krehbiel finds an American tune in a phrase of four measures announced by the horn in the first allegro. It is "American," because it has a rhythmical construction "characteristic of the music which has a popular charm in this country;" and this rhythmical construction is what? Why, the Scot's snap, "a device common in Scottish music," and "it is found in Hungarian music, too." Therefore, it is American.

The phrase, this American phrase, "is built on the pentatonic, or five-note, scale, which omits the fourth and seventh tones of our ordinary diatonic series." Now, this scale, according to Mr. Krehbiel, is Scotch, Irish, Chinese, "for the old music of these peoples and many others is marked by this peculiarity." Therefore, it is American.

Then the subsidiary melody "gives a somewhat Oriental tinge to the movement." Therefore it is American.

Let us quote again from Mr. Krehbiel:

"Here is the melody which will cling most pertinaciously to the memory of those who hear the symphony, and which they will most quickly recognize as containing the spirit of the music which the people, as a whole, like best. It is Irish, it is Scotch, it is American."

The next specimen of Americanism discovered by Mr. Krehbiel is in the larghetto where, to use his language, "we are estopped from seeking forms that are naive and thrown wholly upon a study of the spirit. It is Dr. Dvorak's proclamation of the mood which he found in the story of Hiawatha's wooing, as set forth in Longfellow's poem." Hiawatha was an Indian. Therefore the symphony is American.

In the finale Mr. Krehbiel finds a paraphrase of "Yankee Doodle." Here at last by association is something American. But the tune "Yankee Doodle" is of English origin.

Some, with Mr. Krehbiel, regard this symphony as an "American" work. Others, with that brilliant and accomplished writer, Mr. James G. Hume, think that the symphony is delightful and not "American."

But let Mr. Hume speak for himself concerning the symphony:

"The themes are simple and understandable, their exposition enjoyable, and the lustre and brilliancy of the instrumentation, the many delightful rhythms, all conspire toward making the symphony a popular work. And it has that unmistakable ring of the folk song which will endear it to all nationalities. Yet the American symphony, like the American novel, has yet to be written. And when it is, it will have been composed by an American. This is said with all due deference to the commanding genius of Dr. Dvorak. * * * Its (the symphony's) extremely Celtic character was patent to numerous people, and the general opinion seemed to be that Dvorak had not been long in discovering what a paramount factor the Irish were in the political life of this country. Said one: 'Why not call it the "Tammany Hall" Symphony? That is, Indian and Irish, and are not Indian and Irish American?'"

The discussion of other topics suggested by this word "American" in connection with music must be deferred for the present. A review of the symphony as performed last evening in Music Hall will be found in another column of this Journal.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Franz Kneisel.

Dvorak's "From the New World" Symphony Played—The Coming Sivicinski Recitals—Tonight's Concerts—Final Nights of "Venus"—The D'Arville Benefit—Notes.

Director Emil Pauor is to be sincerely thanked for his action in giving so early a hearing in this city of Dr. Dvorak's new symphony "Z Nového Sveta" ("From the New World") which is still in manuscript, and had its first hearing only two weeks ago at the New York Philharmonic concert. It is not often that a work arouses so much criticism as this has on account of the pronounced views expressed by the composer soon after his arrival in America, to occupy his present position at the head of the National conservatory. It will be remembered that in a newspaper interview (which, it may be well to say in passing, correctly represented his views) Dr. Dvorak at that time expressed his opinion that the American folk songs had been singularly neglected by the composers in this country, and that in these native melodies could be found subjects worthy of symphonic treatment.

A great many writers have undertaken to explain what Dr. Dvorak meant in expressing these opinions, but no one has given such a satisfactory explanation as he himself has done in the symphony heard last evening.

It is doubtful if many musicians or music lovers in the North appreciate the native ability of the southern colored people for originating such melodies as form the basis of the folk songs of the northern nations of Europe. Those who visited Richmond and the large southern cities shortly after the war had the best opportunity of becoming acquainted with this peculiar faculty of the native southern darkey. In the large tobacco factories of these cities at that time could be found representatives of nearly all the southern states, and their custom of weaving together the tunes, with which they were familiar in their old southern homes, afforded to Northern visitors an unusual opportunity of becoming acquainted with the real negro music of the South.

In one of the big shops of Richmond at that time there existed a gang of some 20 darkeys who had gained almost a national reputation for their skill in constructing these composite songs. Each one contributed to them and by constantly repeating them for their own gratification and that of their visitors they acquired a repertoire which gave this particular shop an enviable reputation throughout the South.

Dr. Dvorak has been singularly successful in portions of his symphony in catching the spirit of this class of southern melodies, and the first and second movements, an adagio and larghetto, are particularly suggestive of the music the northern visitors used to hear in their trips to Rich-

Solo:

MME. AMALIA

140
more. These two movements are by all odds the most interesting portions of the work—the scherzo and the final allegro being less interesting and having fewer of the characteristics which are naturally to be expected in such a symphony.

As a whole, however, the new work commands the warmest praise, and the fashion in which Dvorak has thrown down the gauntlet to the modern school of writers, and substituted tunes for harmonies, is a subject for sincere congratulation.

The work is of heroic proportions, and the masterly fashion in which the composer has treated his subjects cannot fail to impress any audience the world over. The beautiful themes which are made to reappear with such fascinating skill in the opening movement are well worthy the ornamental treatment given them, and there can be but one opinion regarding this portion of the work, and that one the highest praise for its ideas and construction.

The larghetto will attain the greater popularity doubtless on account of the singular beauty of the song upon which it is based, the melody being one easily memorized and recalled with rare satisfaction. In the marvellously ingenious orchestral combinations of this movement are shown the master's hand in the most unmistakable fashion and the weird character of the song gives a still further source of enjoyment to the hearer.

The scherzo is more in the familiar style of the composer than any other movement, and although it lacks the new idea of the preceding portions of the work, it is vastly enjoyable. In the final movement the opening is so broadly dramatic that the expectation is raised to a pitch that is not fully justified by the remainder of the movement, and, by contrast, this is the least satisfactory portion of the symphony.

Mr. Paugave the work his best efforts, and no composer could ask for better treatment than that which "From the New World" symphony got on this occasion. The audience were keenly alive to both the merits of the work and its performance, and gave evidence of their approval by as enthusiastic applause as has been bestowed upon any of the season's performances.

Following the symphony came the appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist in Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, opus 61. Familiar though this concerto is, and coming in such strong contrast with the new symphony, there was much to enjoy and heartily appreciate in the treatment given it by Mr. Kneisel and the orchestra on this occasion. When the soloist stepped to his place beside the leader's desk he was not left in doubt as to his popularity with the Symphony audiences, for the reception given him was one of which any artist might be proud. His playing was characterized by the same purity of tone and exquisite delicacy he has at all times been noted for, and his merits were again rapturously applauded as he completed his task.

It was left for the famous overture by Tchaikowsky, "1812," to show what the new conductor is capable of in the class of compositions to which this belongs. There was a good deal of noise, but it was musical noise, and the effects were so grandly worked out by the men under Mr. Paug's baton that the audience was wrought to the highest pitch of excitement, and it only needed for the conductor to give them the signal to have had them join en masse in the "Marseillaise," which forms the basis for the grand climax of the composition. The instrumentation calls for about everything known in orchestral or military band combination, the ordinary instruments of strings, wind and percussion are reinforced by triangles, bells, cannon, and probably musketry, and the amount of noise in the finale is limited only by the physical ability of the musicians engaged in its performance. Possibly the late lamented P. S. Gilmore could have done more with this show piece than Mr. Paug; but the audience were evidently satisfied with the effects produced in its performance, and not a little fun was caused by observing the vim with which the back row of the orchestra engaged in their duties. The gentleman who was made responsible for the cannon effects is to be congratulated upon the strength of his drumhead and upon his own excellent physical condition.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Materna will be the soloist, and the programme will be made up of Wagnerian selections.

First Performance in Boston of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony—Other Harmonic Happenings.

Last night's symphony concert audience had the pleasure of listening to the first performance in this city of Antonin Dvorak's symphony "The New World." Much interest has been taken in this work, as it is the first important composition by Dvorak since he has become a resident of this country, and one which it was promised would prove the foundation for a school of music to be distinctly characteristic of American folk songs.

Mr Dvorak came to this country about a year and a half ago, and it was shortly after his arrival here that he announced his intention of writing the symphony heard yesterday. It was generally understood that he intended to construct his "New World Symphony" out of negro and Indian melodies on the supposition that this is the only style of music native to the new world. A good many people had believed, and probably do still believe, that there is no folk music in America, that what passes for such is an imported article, and in no sense characteristic of the section of the country or the class of people it is supposed to represent.

Mr Dvorak maintained that there was American folk music, if not that of the whole people, yet expressive of certain distinct phases of American life, climate, domestic conditions and historical events. From this folk music he believed that the American school of music must draw its inspiration, so began his task of writing an American symphony.

It seems to have been a delusion to suppose that Mr Dvorak intended to build his symphony on melodies such as "Down on the Swanee River" and "Yankee Doodle," which are popularly accepted as the nearest approach to American folk songs. He meant to go further back than the birth of these songs, in other words, to the original music of the new world.

With full knowledge of these intentions on the part of Mr Dvorak yesterday's audience gave rapt attention to the performance of the symphony and waited expectantly for the appearance of melodies characteristic of America. It is fair to presume that these expectations were not generally fulfilled.

141
Indeed, to be honest, it must be said that were it not for the title one would not be inclined to suppose that this symphony was any more characteristic of America than of France, Germany, Ireland or the South Sea islands.

But the "New World" symphony is a magnificent composition. Whether or not it is American in character it is certainly the grandest symphony yet written in this country. Its performance was a genuine delight, and the audience expressed its pleasure in a manner that was cordial far beyond custom.

The symphony is in four movements and written for the ordinary orchestra. It is a brilliant work from first to last and is full of melody and variety. The orchestral scoring is superb. Mr Dvorak has long been acknowledged a master of orchestration but he has done nothing better than his latest work.

The first movement, adagio, is suggestive of tremendous energy and vivacity, at times it is tragic and might very properly be considered as characteristic of the first savages of America or any other country.

The second, a slow movement, was received with the greatest favor. It is, indeed, an exquisite composition. The statement has been made that this movement of the symphony was written as the expression of certain moods found in American poetry and definitely embodied in Longfellow's "Hiawatha."

The scherzo is written in a forceful and effective manner, and is notable for its originality in treatment. The final movement is a grand climax of a splendid work.

An excellent performance was given the symphony under Mr Paug's direction.

The Dvorak symphony was not, however, the only interesting feature of last night's concert. Beethoven's grand concerto for violin was admirably played by Mr Franz Kneisel. It is generally acknowledged that Mr Kneisel is entitled to the first rank among resident Boston violinists. His playing yesterday established his position yet more firmly. His greeting was demonstratively cordial, and there were half a dozen recalls when he had concluded the performance of the very difficult concerto.

The final number played by the orchestra was Tchaikowsky's overture, and the melodious work received satisfactory interpretation.

Dvorak's "American" symphony, first heard in public by the Philharmonic audience of New York, about a fortnight ago, had its second formal presentation at the Symphony concert last night. Since its author expressed his opinion that fit subjects for symphonic treatment might be found on this side of the Atlantic, curiosity and discussion have been busy,—now inquiring what he could possibly have meant, and now asserting that he must have meant this, that or the other. Of course the idea most frequently attributed to him was that either the "hoe-downs" and "spirituals" of the Southern negro or the mild, mellifluous melodies of Stephen Foster must supply the themes. So imagination expanded itself upon his own probable utilization of such material, while contempt elevated its nose at the thought of such trivialities and platitudes serving as the bases for even a modern and unclassical symphonic development. Nobody seems to have thought of a symbolic, aesthetic, poetic and psychological composition, designed to suggest to appreciative perception the broad moods and deep impressions induced in a sensitive and perhaps rhapsodical nature by the sight of a vast continent, a strange conglomeration of manifold human elements, a brief, eventful history, and a swift, vehement development whose chief tendencies and whose ultimate goal cannot yet be so much as divined.

This is what Dvorak presents us in the four movements of his superb and beautiful symphony. He has wrought it out with a fervor which can be felt and is manifested no less in tenderness than in might. He has clung close to the tradition and the form of the classic period and while his bold and diversified use of full instrumental means, his skill in scholastic contrasts and his artful evolutions and blendings of chief subjects and of subsidiary episodes will gratify and content the musician, the average auditor will find his thoughts simple and distinct and his exposition of them so lucid and natural that they are never lost in the mazes of phrase or obscured by the invention of counterpoint and technical figuration.

The symphony comes with no clue to its composer's feeling and intention and it will necessarily represent many things to its many listeners. Upon one point, however, will all agree—that its unity of spirit and its growth toward a logical and powerful conclusion are remarkable and delightful. We may have our fancies with the rest of the public, and they shape themselves roughly thus, as they needs must after a single hearing: The first movement, opening with a short but potent and insistent adagio, and passing thence into the wild, emphatic accent which the folk songs and the popular dances of so many undeveloped nations show, suggests the free, urgent, irregular and vigorous life of primitive peoples, with whom energy, courage and a narrow range were qualified by some rhythmic sense and some imaginative fancy. The exquisitely placid larghetto, which will make itself at home at once in every susceptible being, suggests the vast and almost void expanse of nature—smooth, wide, still lakes; rivers calm in their strong flow; savannahs and prairies lying lone and silent; forests and mountains motionless and grave; in a word a whole land waiting for its possessor. The scherzo is instinct with a lively vitality which might imply the curiosity, the surprise and the pleasure of the discoverer, while the half-martial character of its trio could stand for pride and hope in the assumption of ownership, as the quaint beat of an under theme would intimate that the native denizen is still an element to be considered. The final allegro is immensely active and abundantly opulent in confidence, aspiration and determination, as if representative of great achievement and constant ambition.

The musical unity of the work is patent, as has been said, and the kind of feeling set in the first mond. These two movements are by all odds the most interesting portions of the work—the scherzo and the final allegro being less interesting and having fewer of the characteristics which are naturally to be expected in such a symphony.

As a whole, however, the new work commands the warmest praise, and the fashion in which Dvorak has thrown down the gauntlet to the modern school of writers, and substituted tunes for harmonies, is a subject for sincere congratulation.

The work is of heroic proportions, and the masterly fashion in which the composer has treated his subjects cannot fail to impress any audience the world over. The beautiful themes which are made to reappear with such fascinating skill in the opening movement are well worthy the ornamental treatment given them, and there can be but one opinion regarding this portion of the work, and that one the highest praise for its ideas and construction.

The larghetto will attain the greater popularity doubtless on account of the singular beauty of the song upon which it is based, the melody being one easily memorized and recalled with rare satisfaction. In the marvellously ingenious orchestral combinations of this movement are shown the master's hand in the most unmistakable fashion and the weird character of the song gives a still further source of enjoyment to the hearer.

The scherzo is more in the familiar style of the composer than any other movement, and although it lacks the new idea of the preceding portions of the work, it is vastly enjoyable. In the final movement the opening is so broadly dramatic that the expectation is raised to a pitch that is not fully justified by the remainder of the movement, and, by contrast, this is the least satisfactory portion of the symphony.

Mr. Paur gave the work his best efforts, and no composer could ask for better treatment than that which "The New World" symphony got on this occasion. The audience were keenly alive to both the merits of the work and its performance, and gave evidence of their approval by as enthusiastic applause as has been bestowed upon any of the season's performances.

Following the symphony came the appearance of Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist in Beethoven's violin concerto in D major, opus 61. Familiar though this concerto is, and coming in such strong contrast with the new symphony, there was much to enjoy and heartily appreciate in the treatment given it by Mr. Kneisel and the orchestra on this occasion. When the soloist stepped to his place beside the leader's desk he was not left in doubt as to his popularity with the Symphony audiences, for the reception given him was one of which any artist might be proud. His playing was characterized by the same purity of tone and exquisite delicacy he has at all times been noted for, and his merits were again rapturously applauded as he completed his task.

It was left for the famous overture by Tchaikowsky, "1812," to show what the new conductor is capable of in the class of compositions to which this belongs. There was a good deal of noise, but it was musical noise, and the effects were so grandly worked out by the men under Mr. Paur's baton that the audience was wrought to the highest pitch of excitement, and it only needed for the conductor to give them the signal to have had them join en masse in the "Marseillaise," which forms the basis for the grand climax of the composition. The instrumentation calls for about everything known in orchestral or military band combination. The ordinary instruments of strings, wind and percussion are re-enforced by triangles, bells, cannon, and probably musketry, and the amount of noise in the finale is limited only by the physical ability of the musicians engaged in its performance. Possibly the late lamented P. S. Gilmore could have done more with this show piece than Mr. Paur; but the audience were evidently satisfied with the effects produced in its performance, and not a little fun was caused by observing the vim with which the back row of the orchestra engaged in their duties. The gentleman who was made responsible for the cannon effects is to be congratulated upon the strength of his drumhead and upon his own excellent physical condition.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Materna will be the soloist, and the programme will be made up of Wagnerian selections.

First Performance in Boston of Dvorak's "New World" Symphony—Other Harmonic Happenings.

Last night's symphony concert audience had the pleasure of listening to the first performance in this city of Antonin Dvorak's symphony "The New World." Much interest has been taken in this work, as it is the first important composition by Dvorak since he has become a resident of this country, and one which it was promised would prove the foundation for a school of music to be distinctly characteristic of American folk songs.

Mr Dvorak came to this country about a year and a half ago, and it was shortly after his arrival here that he announced his intention of writing the symphony heard yesterday. It was generally understood that he intended to construct his "New World Symphony" out of negro and Indian melodies on the supposition that this is the only style of music native to the new world. A good many people had believed, and probably do still believe, that there is no folk music in America, that what passes for such is an imported article, and in no sense characteristic of the section of the country or the class of people it is supposed to represent.

Mr Dvorak maintained that there was American folk music, if not that of the whole people, yet expressive of certain distinct phases of American life, climate, domestic conditions and historical events. From this folk music he believed that the American school of music must draw its inspiration, so began his task of writing an American symphony.

It seems to have been a delusion to suppose that Mr Dvorak intended to build his symphony on melodies such as "Down on the Swannee River" and "Yankee Doodle," which are popularly accepted as the nearest approach to American folk songs. He meant to go further back than the birth of these songs, in other words, to the original music of the new world.

With full knowledge of these intentions on the part of Mr Dvorak yesterday's audience gave rapt attention to the performance of the symphony and waited expectantly for the appearance of melodies characteristic of America. It is fair to presume that these expectations were not generally fulfilled.

Indeed, to be honest, it must be said that were it not for the title one would not be inclined to suppose that this symphony was any more characteristic of America than of France, Germany, Ireland or the South Sea islands.

"But the 'New World' symphony is a magnificent composition. Whether or not it is American in character it is certainly the grandest symphony yet written in this country. Its performance was a genuine delight, and the audience expressed its pleasure in a manner that was cordial far beyond custom.

The symphony is in four movements and written for the ordinary orchestra. It is a brilliant work from first to last and is full of melody and variety. The orchestral scoring is superb. Mr Dvorak has long been acknowledged a master of orchestration but he has done nothing better than his latest work.

The first movement, adagio, is suggestive of tremendous energy and vivacity, at times it is tragic and might very properly be considered as characteristic of the first savages of America or any other country.

The second, a slow movement, was received with the greatest favor. It is, indeed, an exquisite composition. The statement has been made that this movement of the symphony was written as the expression of certain moods found in American poetry and definitely embodied in Longfellow's "Hiawatha."

The scherzo is written in a forceful and effective manner, and is notable for its originality in treatment. The final movement is a grand climax of a splendid work.

An excellent performance was given the symphony under Mr Paur's direction.

The Dvorak symphony was not, however, the only interesting feature of last night's concert. Beethoven's grand concerto for violin was admirably played by Mr Franz Kneisel. It is generally acknowledged that Mr Kneisel is entitled to the first rank among resident Boston violinists. His playing yesterday established his position yet more firmly. His greeting was demonstratively cordial, and there were half a dozen recalls when he had concluded the performance of the very difficult concerto.

The final number played by the orchestra was Tchaikowsky's overture, and the melodious work received satisfactory interpretation.

Dvorak's "American" symphony, first heard in public by the Philharmonic audience of New York, about a fortnight ago, had its second formal presentation at the Symphony concert last night. Since its author expressed his opinion that fit subjects for symphonic treatment might be found on this side of the Atlantic, curiosity and discussion have been busy,—now inquiring what he could possibly have meant, and now asserting that he must have meant this, that or the other. Of course the idea most frequently attributed to him was that either the "hoe-downs" and "spirituals" of the Southern negro or the mild, mellifluous melodies of Stephen Foster must supply the themes. So imagination expanded itself upon his own probable utilization of such material, while contempt elevated its nose at the thought of such trivialities and platitudes serving as the bases for even a modern and unclassical symphonic development. Nobody seems to have thought of a symbolic, aesthetic, poetic and psychological composition, designed to suggest to appreciative perception the broad moods and deep impressions induced in a sensitive and perhaps rhapsodical nature by the sight of a vast continent, a strange conglomeration of manifold human elements, a brief, eventful history, and a swift, vehement development whose chief tendencies and whose ultimate goal cannot yet be so much as divined.

This is what Dvorak presents us in the four movements of his superb and beautiful symphony. He has wrought it out with a fervor which can be felt and is manifested no less in tenderness than in might. He has clung close to the tradition and the form of the classic period and while his bold and diversified use of full instrumental means, his skill in scholastic contrasts and his artful evolutions and blendings of chief subjects and of subsidiary episodes will gratify and content the musician, the average auditor will find his thoughts simple and distinct and his exposition of them so lucid and natural that they are never lost in the mazes of phrase or obscured by the invention of counterpoint and technical figuration.

The symphony comes with no clue to its composer's feeling and intention and it will necessarily represent many things to its many listeners. Upon one point, however, will all agree—that its unity of spirit and its growth toward a logical and powerful conclusion are remarkable and delightful. We may have our fancies with the rest of the public, and they shape themselves roughly thus, as they needs must after a single hearing: The first movement, opening with a short but potent and insistent adagio, and passing thence into the wild, emphatic accent which the folk songs and the popular dances of so many undeveloped nations show, suggests the free, urgent, irregular and vigorous life of primitive peoples, with whom energy, courage and a narrow range were qualified by some rhythmic sense and some imaginative fancy. The exquisitely placid larghetto, which will make itself at home at once in every susceptible being, suggests the vast and almost void expanse of nature—smooth, wide, still lakes; rivers calm in their strong flow; savannahs and prairies lying lone and silent; forests and mountains motionless and grave; in a word a whole land waiting for its possessor. The scherzo is instinct with a lively vitality which might imply the curiosity, the surprise and the pleasure of the discoverer, while the half-martial character of its trio could stand for pride and hope in the assumption of ownership, as the quaint beat of an under theme would intimate that the native denizen is still an element to be considered. The final allegro is immensely active and abundantly opulent in confidence, aspiration and determination, as if representative of great achievement and constant ambition.

The musical unity of the work is patent, as has been said, and the kind of feeling set in the first

162
theme, with its clear cut phraseology, is maintained to the close, not only in the temper, but in the turns of expression. Yet this state of mind is not monotonous and its digressions, diversions and episodes are many and make themselves apparent now in devices of orchestration and now in secondary thoughts and side issues, as when one recognizes a bit of "Yankee Doodle" threading itself into the inner tissues of the last movement.

There was another new work on the programme—Tschalkowsky's "1812" overture, which signifies the attempt of Napoleon to conquer his way to the heart of Russia and his defeat in that herculean but impossible attempt. The sturdy, unconquerable, ponderous Russia is represented by the large, steady and solid introduction; then comes the conflict of France, as suggested in the Marseillaise against the hordes of Russian troops and the whirling, withering tempests of the turbulent writer; and finally over the broken fragments of the French song rises in amazing strength and splendor of triumph the Russian music which was heard at first so reserved and calm. Every possible orchestral instrument is used in this climax, and the composer even wanted cannon to help in the stupendous clangor.

The performance of these two works was splendid at all points. In the larghetto of the symphony Mr. Paur obtained pianissimi of which even Mr. Gerlicke might have been proud, while in the overture he evoked a tonality that lacked little of raising the roof.

Between these Mr. Kneisel played Beethoven's violin concerto to perfection in tone, style and detail of execution, and he had his full share of the enthusiastic and spontaneous applause which the whole programme elicited.

Next week's programme will be all Wagner, comprising the usual orchestral selections from the "Meistersinger," "Tristan" and the "Götterdämmerung," together with the "Faust" overture and the "Siegfried Idyl." Mme. Materna will sing in the "Tristan" love music, and add Brunnhilde's lament over Siegfried.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday, although of inordinate length, had points of especial interest which prevented anything like tedium setting in. For the first time since music began, a great composer, one of the modern masters, has taken up our folk-song and built a classical work upon this new foundation. The first presentation of such a work was sufficient to make the occasion historical, and to dignify the concert beyond any of its predecessors. One may acknowledge this without conceding absolute success to the work itself. Brilliant as music, the new symphony by Dvorak, founded on native themes, does not achieve a distinct nationality. It is not more clearly American than Bohemian or Russian. The formation of certain passages upon a scale with a flat seventh is more European than American, for if such scales exist here they come from a remote antiquity in other climes.

The work began with a strange mixture of kettledrum explosions and brooding. When the chief theme was ushered in, however, it proved to have something of the lilt of the plantation, and suggested that accentuation of hand and foot which belongs to Afro-American melody. Yet, for the matter of that, the same characteristic can be traced as far back as scriptural music, and the singing of the psalms in ancient Jerusalem was not widely different from the free improvisation and emphatic rhythm of a Southern camp-meeting, a fact which can easily be proved by references to "clapping of hands" in the Old Testament, by Egyptian pictures of contemporary date, and by a study of the character of the poems as they have come down to us.

Nevertheless we may be permitted to call this lilt and rhythm "American" since it is a characteristic of part of our Southern folk-song.

The development of the phrase which contained the gist of this theme was remarkable and its varied orchestral coloring was full of interest. This first movement seemed, at a single hearing, the finest part of the work, and it was the only portion which gave to the reviewer the impression of being typical.

The slow movement which came next was given over to vagueness and dreamy melancholy. The tone-color was well-chosen, and a tender theme for English horn and a delicate use of woodwind effects made a picture of much beauty, which however, was not of any especial nationality, although a bold episode of lively character and with a drone bass, made some attempt at local color.

The Scherzo was a disappointment, for here at least one might have expected the folk-dance, the break-down, or some flavor of plantation life, just as Mendelssohn threw the Gaelic spirit into the Scherzo of his Scotch symphony. Instead of this one had a reminiscence of the figure with which Beethoven began the Scherzo of his Ninth Symphony, a March-like trio of strong contrast and intrinsic beauty, but very much more of Dvorak and his genius than of America.

The finale presented a bold theme full of dash and brio with dissonances that were still more courageous at the coda. That Europe will play this symphony as a contribution to music from a new quarter, may be confidently predicted, but if transatlantic critics accept it as a portrayal of the spirit of American folk-song they will go far astray. Yet the attempt made in this work will be worth something in the development of our musical resources, and others will dig where Dvorak has done surface mining.

Now followed Beethoven's violin concerto, with Mr. Kneisel as soloist. It was a most satisfactory performance, absolutely free from flaw or fault. That Mr. Kneisel does not give all the breadth that the composition (at least the titanic first movement) can bear, may be conceded;—neither does Sarasate. In intonation, in absolute surety in the midst of the greatest difficulties, in musicianly intelligence in making every point in line with the composer's intention, the performance was a great one, and in the matter of power of tone, too, the artist seems to be advancing. Mr. Kneisel was received with great enthusiasm by the audience and recalls in profusion followed the conclusion of the work. It might have been as well to have ended the composition with the first movement. Spite of the beautiful touches in parts of the second movement, the concerto is overshadowed by the grandeur of its beginning, and the finale lags superfluous upon the stage. Not even the genius of Beethoven could animate the dry bones of this old rondo form, and the strength of the development of the allegro only emphasizes the triviality of the end. This same work was Mr. Kneisel's visiting card when he first came to Boston, and at that time criticism was most anxious to find a flaw in the armor, for he had replaced a long-established concert master of much riper years; it found no weak spot then,—it finds none now.

At this point Mr. Paur "cried 'Havock' and let slip the dogs of war"; at least he gave a composition which it is difficult to review seriously. It was as unfair to bring Tschalkowsky to memory by his "1812" overture as it would have been to commemorate Beethoven with his battle symphony ("The Battle of Vittoria"), and such a racket has not been heard in Music Hall, not even in the days of the cat shows.

The "Marseillaise" attacked an innocent Russian folk-theme, and the result was terrible. The two themes coalesced very much as the Kilkenny cats did, or as the blue paper does with the white in a seidlitz powder. Auditors clung to their seats in excited enthusiasm as the Russian trombones and the French bass drums met; amidst the tumult one could see the brave conductor standing undaunted in the centre of the contending forces; then came the clangor of bells; the writer does not know whether they were the triumphant tones of festival chimes, or whether a general alarm had been turned in from the fire at Moscow, but they were out of tune in either case. Finally the work culminated with a varied assortment of thunderbolts, and now the ear doctors of Boston are with Mr. Paur, to a man.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC. Sarita

The Symphony Concert.

163
The programme for last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: "American" symphony, Dvorak; Concerto for violin, Beethoven; Overture, "1812," Tschalkowsky. There was a large audience, and the chief interest was in the new symphony. We may state at the outset that never has the orchestra acquitted itself more brilliantly than it did on this occasion; and we may add that since Mr. Paur's advent here, never did he give such convincing evidence of his skill and power as a conductor as he vouchsafed at this concert. He made it perfectly clear that he is the right man in the right place, and though we may quarrel with him, now and then, for a certain over-elaborations in his readings of the older masters, there can be no question that he has his orchestra under complete control, and that it has never played better than it has under his direction. Under no previous conductor has it achieved finer results than attended its performances last night, and decidedly no such splendid orchestral playing has been given by the organization, for at least three years, as was heard on this occasion. Technically, the orchestra is up to the very highest point it has reached, and Mr. Paur should receive full credit for the certainty and the rapidity with which he has restored and improved its efficiency. The symphony is a genial work, abundant in graceful melody; is perfectly clear on a first hearing, and is, on the whole, the most interesting of its composer's works in kind. That it is American in any sense, or that it would be suspected as typifying anything American, musical or otherwise, without its suggestive title, we do not believe. In fact, though there is less of the Bohemian color in this music than there is in Dvorak's other compositions, its character is, nevertheless, indicative of the composer's nationality. It is understood that he saturated himself with the songs of the Southern negroes, and that his themes in this work are founded on them; but there is nothing in the symphony that evidences this. Now and then there is a fragment of rhythm that recalls a bit of some long-forgotten "Christy melody," but on the whole it has a thoroughly old-world flavor. The opening adagio is very beautiful, very impressive and is lovely in its orchestral color, but it is genuine Dvorak in conception and treatment. The allegro that follows is fascinating in its gay flow, its brightness, the grace of its themes, but it has nothing that is essentially American in color. In fact, it is not possible that it should have, for we have no music that can be called distinctively American; nothing that is to be singled out as national in style, no peculiar turn that can be recognized as smacking of the soil in the sense that we can say that this or that tune in English, or French, or Italian, or German, or Scandinavian; nothing that carries the mark of its nationality on it as the mark is borne by a Scotch or an Irish tune. It is clear then that Mr. Dvorak's symphony must be judged from a purely musical standpoint and without reference to a national color that it cannot possess. The slow movement is founded on a broad and charming theme, and is full of poetic feeling. It is somewhat over long, and here and there are some dry and labored moments, but its interest is admirably sustained to the end. The scherzo is, from beginning to close, Dvorak, pure and simple! It is frolicsome, bizarre in harmonies and orchestral effects, and fairly astonishing in its vivacity; but is redolent of Bohemia. The finale is a marvel of ingenuity, as far as construction is concerned; its fire is overwhelming; and as it approaches its close the composer rises to an exciting power that has not been surpassed, if equalled, by any modern musician. Its passion is immense; but it is Slavonic passion, not without a touch of genuine Wagnerism, its only suggestion of America being a remote and exceedingly vague suggestion of "Yankee Doodle," which, after all, is no more nor less than a perversion of an English tune known as "Kitty Fisher's Hornpipe." Of the workmanship of the symphony too much cannot be said in the way of admiration. The work, which was received with great admiration, is delightful in its tunefulness, its frankness, its freedom from unmeaning pedantry, its effect of spontaneity and freshness, its healthy tone. Its orchestration throughout is fascinating in its richness, its brilliancy and its well ordered variety of effect. That it will become one of the composer's most popular works seems inevitable; but it will be because of its musical worth and not because it does or does not typify anything American. Some day or other the American symphony will doubtless be written, but when that feat is accomplished it is not likely that it will be by a foreigner thoroughly impregnated with the folk-song of his native land, no heed how much a master of his art he may be. The Tchaikovsky Overture is scarcely worth discussing seriously. In Russia, it doubtless may seem a fitting and a stirring tribute to the triumph of that country over France; but, listened to without any sentiment of patriotism, it is a barbarous jargon of noise; an apotheosis of drum banging, and a glorification of musical sensationalism generally. The ear-deafening close of the work is almost comical in its blatant earthquakiness of effect. However, the audience went fairly wild over it. The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who gave an exceedingly finished and elegant, if not a very virile, performance of the violin concerto. He was applauded with great enthusiasm, and was three times recalled. The programme for the next concert is to be devoted entirely to Wagner, with Madame Materna as the soloist.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY.

First Time of Dvorak's Misnamed "American Symphony."

The 10th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, presenting the following programme:

Symphony No. 5, in E minor, "From the New World".....Dvorak
Concerto for violin, in D major, (Cadenzas by Joachim).....Beethoven
Overture, "1812," in E flat major.....Tchaikowsky.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist.

The great interest of this occasion centred in the performance for the first time in these concerts of Dvorak's latest symphony which has been advertised extensively, but misleadingly, as an "American Symphony."

The idea of writing this work was probably brought to the mind of Dvorak through a suggestion of Mr. James G. Huncker, the eminent critic of the New York Musical Courier, to which suggestion Dvorak listened attentively and evidently with interest in the idea advanced. Dvorak then studied some of the characteristic melodies of the American negro, and possibly some Indian phrases, and out of this musical digest evolved the themes that appear in this symphony. These themes are presented in the form of simple folk-song, being striking in character and adaptable to a symphonic treatment. That any of these themes are nationally American cannot be claimed, for with a slight stretch of the imagination they could be accepted by most any nationality of the Old World, being quite as oriental as occidental in their flavor.

There is a strong resemblance in the first and principal theme of the opening movement of the symphony, to the nigger tunes sung to the twanging accompaniment of the banjo and the tap of the heel, by the older minstrel composers, the "Alleghenians," the "Christy Minstrels," etc., but otherwise there is nothing that can be recognized as a familiar air of the American people. The slight burlesque on Yankee Doodle in the violas that occurs in the final movement will not serve in modifying this statement in the least.

This symphony was first played at the second concert of the New York Symphony Society under the direction of Mr. Seidl, Dec. 16, being heard of course at the rehearsal of the afternoon previous. On this occasion it was extensively boomed in the New York Tribune in an elaborate article from the pen of Mr. Krehbiel, as well as through a most extraordinary panegyric by Mr. Steinberg in the New York Herald. The latter was something ridiculous in its conclusion.

It matters little what the claims may be of those who see in the composition of this symphony the foundation of an American school of symphonic writing, for time will prove the folly of such conclusions, but it is with gratification that every critical listener recognized in Dvorak's work a composition of fine proportions. Whatever may have stimulated this eminent composer, it is sufficient that his inspiration has never brought forth more spontaneous results.

If it possesses little or nothing that is distinctively American in color, it is none the less an intensely interesting and charming work. The adagio and the scherzo, which are without a suggestion of anything American in their conception, are movements of characteristic value in their respective modes. The depth of poetical feeling that marks the adagio, and the vivacity, the brilliancy and the unique instrumental effects that characterize the scherzo are the outcome of the genius of Dvorak unbridled by any attempt at the delineation of any national music.

There is a fine display of ingenuity in the working out of the last movement; so also has the composer displayed his masterly hand in the first movement. Best of all in this symphony, however, is the simplicity and clearness of the themes and the elaboration also. The polyphony is never obscure; it is easily followed. Neither does it lose in value musically because of this clearness. It is a reproach upon the mysticism and cacophony of many of our modern writers. When one remembers this clearness, as well as the variety and piquancy of the rhythms, the beautiful color of the instrumentation, and the fine contrasts in the dynamic expression, it is easy to bespeak for this work a popularity that will become world wide.

Perhaps of greater importance to us locally was the manner in which the orchestra performed this composition. It settled at once any doubt as to the capabilities of Mr. Paur as a conductor worthy of the position so successfully sustained by Mr. Gericke.

Mr. Paur was alert to every demand of this remarkable symphony, and holding his orchestra in a firm grasp revealed thereby every nuance of the composition. That inflexible and careful carving of the phrases that has caused some to complain when criticizing Mr. Paur's renderings was entirely absent on this occasion, and the music had its rhythmic swing uninterrupted. Also there was a surprising advance in the matter of gradation of tone.

Such splendid results as were made manifest in the playing of this work must have satisfied the cravings of the most exacting of critics. If this is the standard that is to be maintained throughout, then will the patrons of these concerts rejoice and praise the good fortune that has sent us so able a conductor as Mr. Paur. How gratifying it is for the critic to acknowledge such masterly conducting.

When Mr. Kneisel appeared to play his solo he was welcomed so warmly that he was obliged to bow many times before the applause ended. Then followed a most finished and technically accurate performance of the Beethoven concerto. There is always a classical purity to whatever Mr. Kneisel presents in his artistic efforts. His taste is exquisite. He was recalled several times at the end of the concerto. Mr. Paur conducted the accompaniment with great discretion; a difficult task indeed.

The Tchaikowsky overture was replete with the characteristics of its eminent composer. The invasion of Russia and the repulse of the French were depicted in this composer's well known realistic manner. The ending was without doubt the most tremendous din ever heard within the walls of the Music Hall. When one says that it took six players to "man" the percussion instruments, and that not one bass drum but two were brought to bear in the moment of rejoicing, to which was added a chime of bells, nothing more could seem to have been asked to intensify the din, unless the whole audience had joined in hurrahs! and a climax gained by the explosion of a dynamite bomb, could it have been accomplished without other effects than its terrific detonation. I have always declared that nothing pleased the symphony audience so much as a tremendous noise (Nikisch proved that time and time again), so on Saturday evening at the termination of Tschalkowsky's din this cultured aggregation burst forth with shouts and uproarious applause. It is to be hoped that Mr. Paur will not too frequently encourage this latent tendency upon the part of his audience, that merely sleeps to be awakened at a trumpet call or the sound of the stirring drum. Next Saturday evening the programme will be made up of Wagner selections. Mrs. Materna will be the soloist.

166
WARREN DAVENPORT.

167
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, AT 8, P. M.

WAGNER PROGRAMME.

PRELUDE to 'Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg,' C major.

VORSPEIL UND "LIEBESTOD" (Prelude and "Love-death") from "Tristan und Isolde."

Isolde: MME. MATERNA.

SIEGFRIED IDYL.

A FAUST OVERTURE.

"SIEGFRIED'S FUNERAL MARCH, from "Götterdämmerung." Act III., Scene 2.

BRÜNNHILDE'S DYING SPEECH OVER SIEGFRIED'S BODY, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III, Scene 3.

Brünnhilde: MME. MATERNA.

Soloist:

MME. AMALIA MATERNA.

166
most tremendous noise ever heard within the walls of the Music Hall. When one says that it took six players to "man" the percussion instruments, and that not one bass drum but two were brought to bear in the moment of rejoicing, to which was added a chime of bells, nothing more could seem to have been asked to intensify the din, unless the whole audience had joined in hurrahs! and a climax gained by the explosion of a dynamite bomb, could it have been accomplished without other effects than its terrific detonation. I have always declared that nothing pleased the symphony audience so much as a tremendous noise (Nikisch proved that time and time again), so on Saturday evening at the termination of Tschaiakowsky's din this cultured aggregation burst forth with shouts and uproarious applause. It is to be hoped that Mr. Paur will not too frequently encourage this latent tendency upon the part of his audience, that merely sleeps to be awakened at a trumpet call or the sound of the stirring drum. Next Saturday evening the programme will be made up of Wagner selections. Mrs. Materna will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

167
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 6, AT 8. P. M.

WAGNER PROGRAMME.

PRELUDE to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg," C major.

VORSPEIL UND "LIEBESTOD" (Prelude and "Love-death") from "Tristan und Isolde."

Isolde: MME. MATERNA.

SIEGFRIED IDYL.

A FAUST OVERTURE.

"SIEGFRIED'S FUNERAL MARCH, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., Scene 2.

BRÜNNHILDE'S DYING SPEECH OVER SIEGFRIED'S BODY, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III, Scene 3.

Brünnhilde: MME. MATERNA.

Soloist:

MME. AMALIA MATERNA.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY.

A Wagner Programme with Mme. Materna as Soloist.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. Mrs. Amalia Materna was the soloist. The programme was as follows:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg," C major.
Vorspiel und "Liebestod" (Prelude and "Love-death") from "Tristan und Isolde." Isolde; Mme. Materna.
Siegfried Idyl.
A Faust Overture.
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., scene 2.
Brunnhilde's Dying Speech over Siegfried's Body, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., scene 3.
Brunnhilde; Mme. Materna.

A Wagner programme is almost always sure to attract a large audience and on this occasion the hall was filled to overflowing with an interested gathering of listeners that remained intact until the end of this quite lengthy programme. The playing of the orchestra was of the first quality, and Mr. Paur really achieved a triumph. It was plainly evident that he was familiar with the scores, and to his credit it must be said that Wagner has never before been so satisfactorily presented in Boston. There was a gratifying degree of repose at the proper moments in Conductor Paur's interpretation of the selections chosen that intensified the effect of the performance when the highly dramatic passages appeared.

The playing of the "Siegfried Idyl" was indescribably beautiful. Better playing has seldom been heard from this superb orchestra. One can praise equally the entire performance.

Mr. Paur's conception of Wagner is remarkably comprehensive, and at the same time so wonderfully happy in the working out of the detail, so delicate, and so sensitively refined in all the nuances of the composition, that it renders the coarse interpretation we have had from such noise dispensing and inferior conductors as Seidl and Nikisch appear as a satire on the intentions of this great master of modern musical forms. Seidl and Nikisch can both sit at the feet of Conductor Paur and learn much to their advantage.

Mrs. Materna encompassed the spirit and intention of the author, and delineated to the best of her vocal ability the demands of the situation. It was an inspired effort upon her part, and if it failed of effect always it was because no human voice is capable of effectively meeting such extraordinary demands. This is one of the incongruities of the Wagner music-drama.

The audience did not appear to appreciate the marvellous manner in which Mr. Paur revealed either the beauties of the "Siegfried Idyl" or the fanciful ideas of "A Faust Overture." Perhaps, after the four years that its taste has been vitiated by the coarse and vulgar interpretation of every class of music that came from the baton of Mr. Paur's immediate predecessor, it is not to be wondered that it failed to recognize the highly artistic and refined efforts of Mr. Paur in his masterly presentation of the pieces named.

But the tremendous effect gained with the ending of the last number upon the programme brought the audience to its feet and it indulged in the most enthusiastic applause.

This was the cause of Mrs. Materna returning many times to bow, but finally someone with a lusty shout called for Paur! Paur! Then modestly appeared the hero of the occasion to receive a most tumultuous applause, with shouts of bravo! bravo!

This praise was modestly received by Conductor Paur. And how genuinely modest is this man—how simple, how frank and how earnest! That sort of an appearance of hangdog affectation that Nikisch often showed is entirely foreign to such a nature as Conductor Paur possesses.

Mr. Paur deserved every bit of the praise that was accorded him on this occasion, and more besides. It must be said that his success with the programme was greater than even his most ardent admirers had expected.

There will be no concert next Saturday evening. On Saturday evening, Jan. 20, the following programme will be performed: Suite in B minor, for string orchestra and flutes, Bach; Symphony No. 3, in A minor, "Scotch," Mendelssohn, and overture, "King Lear," Berlioz.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

[See Page Six.]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was made up wholly of selections from the works of Richard Wagner, and was as follows:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg."
Prelude and "Isoldens Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde."
A Siegfried Idyl.
"Eine Faust-Ouverture."
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., Scene 2.
Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Götterdämmerung," Act III., Scene 3.
Mme. Amalia Materna was the singer.

All these selections are pretty familiar here, having been frequently heard at concerts and, with the exception of the scene from "Tristan," at least once or twice on the stage. Curiously enough, they are all examples of Wagner's third manner; the "Faust-Ouverture," to be sure, was first written in 1840, thus dating from the "Rienzi" period; but it was remodelled from beginning to end in 1855, about a year before the completion of the music of "Die Walküre," so that, in its present shape, it fairly belongs to the composer's third manner. The programme was very well arranged, saving that it was a little long; we think the "Faust-Ouverture" might well have been left out; it, as well as the two succeeding numbers, is essentially tragic in character, and thus helped to make the second half of the concert rather grimly serious.

The orchestra played admirably almost throughout, falling short of perfect finish in execution only in parts of the closing scene from "Götterdämmerung." In one place in the "Siegfried Funeral March" the absence of two of the required tubas made some havoc with the phrase, but the want of them was in general not seriously felt. We have a suspicion, however, that some of the wind parts in both the selections from "Götterdämmerung" were not strictly in accordance with the original score, but belonged to a condensed concert version for smaller orchestra; but in this we may be wrong.

Mr. Paur's reading of the several numbers, barring an occasional tendency to over-slowness, was admirable. We have seldom heard the "Meistersinger" prelude go so well, and the "Siegfried Idyl" was given to perfection. Mme. Materna, whom one was heartily glad to welcome back here once more, sang wonderfully. Her voice has lost very little, if any, of its commanding beauty of quality, and in the matter of perfect accuracy of intonation her singing left nothing to be desired. But above all this her warmth, depth and beauty of feeling and dramatic force of expression were what gave her performance its superb character. In the matter of correct tradition, derived from the fountain head itself, she is still impeccable; her absolute mastery over and sympathy with Wagner's idea, and her rich, receptive artistic nature enable her fully to incarnate and realize this idea; her singing of the scenes from "Tristan" and "Götterdämmerung" is not only mustergiltig (model-worthy), but instinct with the finest dramatic power. We cannot remember anyone artist's creating such a furor at one of our symphony concerts as she did last Saturday evening. The audience simply went wild with enthusiasm, and had the best of reasons therefor. The next programme is: Bach, suite in B minor for strings and flutes; Mendelssohn, symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch"); Berlioz, overture to "Le Roi Lear."

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was devoted wholly to Wagner, as follows: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"; Vorspiel and "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde"; the Siegfried Idyl; the "Faust" overture; Siegfried's Funeral March and Brunnhilde's lament over Siegfried's body, from "Götterdämmerung." This is a very large dose of Wagner for one evening, but there were doubtless many in the audience who enjoyed every bar of it. However, to others, who were not enthusiastic worshippers of Wagner, it proved somewhat cloying, not to say wearisome. All the selections had been heard frequently at these concerts, and Mr. Krehbiel kindly came on from New York, on several occasions, to explain to us the meaning of several of them, in order that we might be enabled to palpitate with the right emotion, anent them. It might have added interest to the occasion if he could have been induced to enlighten us regarding them at this concert, but the chances are that he would have found serious objections, owing to the fact that a hearing of the Dvorak American Symphony caused him so much discomfort that he cryptographically pronounced the orchestra to be "N. G." There is nothing new to be said about the music. Of the performances we feel justified in writing in the warmest terms of commendation. Mr. Paur's readings were masterly throughout, and the playing of the orchestra was faultless. The "Meistersinger" overture had never been given here with the perfect clearness that attended its interpretation by Mr. Paur, last night. The Idyl was also beautifully read and played. The soloist was Mme. Materna, who sang the Liebestod from "Tristan," and Brunnhilde's lament. She acquitted herself with all necessary robustness of style, and doubtless with thorough fidelity to the composer's intentions. She certainly declaimed with great dramatic fervor. For singing, pure and simple, the music affords slight opportunity; and it must be said that the voice part in the score has little meaning or interest without its proper stage surroundings. In fact, it has little meaning under any conditions. The words are of the chief importance, and these can only seldom be heard through the din of the orchestra. Madame Materna's voice sounded worn in its middle notes, and her high notes alone were effective. These she shouted forth with penetrating effect, and doubtless achieved all that could be achieved under the circumstances. She was applauded with furious enthusiasm, which proves that musical noise is not without appreciation. The programme for the next concert is: Suite, B-minor, Bach; Scotch Symphony, Mendelssohn; Overture, "King Lear," Berlioz.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert Soloist, Mme. Materna.

Josef Slivinski's Boston Debut—The New Music Hall Site Bought—A Grand Opera Season Promised—This Evening's Attractions—Events of the Coming Week—Notes.

Conductor Emil Paur evidently pleased himself, and certainly gratified his patrons of the symphony concerts, last evening, by presenting them with a programme exclusively confined to excerpts from the Wagner music dramas.

Whatever opinions may be held as to the desirability of concert performances of such programmes, there can be but one opinion in regard to such interpretations of the several numbers as were given by Conductor Paur last evening. His readings showed a thorough familiarity with the Wagnerian repertoire, and were characterized by a dramatic treatment of the several selections eminently in keeping with their characteristics. Without striving for sensational effects, he gave to all the selections a life and freshness that showed him to be a master in the treatment of this school of music.

The prelude to the "Meistersingers," which made the opening number of the programme was magnificently played, its ever varying movements being brought out with splendid strength and dramatic feeling. The "Siegfried" idyl was given with a beauty and delicacy that has rarely been equalled in former performances, and the "Faust" overture had a broadly dramatic reading which was very satisfying. Conductor Paur was equally successful in the great funeral march from "Götterdämmerung," which completed the list of strictly instrumental selections, and was played with magnificent effect.

Mme. Amalia Materna was the soloist of the evening being heard in "Isolde's Love Death" and Brunnhilde's "Dying Speech." This great artist has been absent from Boston for many years, and it was very gratifying to find that time had dealt very gently with her vocal abilities. She will be recalled as one of the principal singers in the German opera seasons of some years ago, and also as the prima donna of the notable Wagner festivals which created such a sensation throughout the country some 10 years ago. She is a great dramatic artist, and her treatment of such numbers as those in which she was heard last evening may well be taken as a standard. The severe tests put to the singer were met with splendid success by Mme. Materna, and she contended with the orchestra in a way to arouse the greatest respect for her physical endurance. Her reception upon her entrance showed that her earlier triumphs were still fresh in the minds of many of the audience, and she was repeatedly recalled to acknowledge the applause which followed each of her numbers.

As a whole Mr. Paur is to be heartily congratulated upon the success of his first Wagnerian programme. It is to be hoped, however, that he will not assume that such programmes are desired often by the patrons of these concerts.

The usual concert and rehearsal will be omitted next week, and on the evening of the 20th inst. the programme will consist of Bach's suite in B minor for flute and strings, Mendelssohn's symphony No. 3 in A minor, and the "King Lear" overture, Berlioz.

THE ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Prelude to "The Master of Singers of Nuremberg"
Prelude and "Isolde's Love Death," from "Tristan and Isolde"
A Siegfried Idyl
A Faust overture
Siegfried's funeral march, from "Götterdämmerung"
Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Götterdämmerung"

Wagner.

These pieces have been played and sung on many occasions and there is no need now of extended criticism. The Wagner of theory would not have allowed such excerpts from his works. The Wagner of practice, no doubt, would have joined heartily in the applause. It may be said that the "Siegfried Idyl" was the feature of last evening's program, and it was played superbly.

In the prelude to the "Master Singers" and in the "Faust overture" the brass was blatant. The string orchestra throughout the evening was most excellent. If the "Faust" overture was omitted, the program would have given greater satisfaction.

Mrs. Materna was not heard in the excerpt from "Tristan and Isolde." She seemed to recognize her inability to cope with the orchestra in this number. In the scene from "Die Götterdämmerung" she was more effective; but the weakness of her middle register in this speech was so noticeable that it precluded full enjoyment.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

A Wagner programme, with a famous Wagnerian singer, was sufficient to crowd Music Hall at the concert of Saturday. The prelude to "The Mastersingers" began the programme. It received a good reading, Mr. Paur being exactly in his element in preserving the clearness of the polyphonic strands of the intricate web; not a sub-theme or a motif was lost, although there was something of rigidity in the presentation of them. Those who imagine that Wagner is formless can study this prelude to advantage, for in its way it is as logical as any overture, and even the violations of contrapuntal laws find extenuation in coherent leading of the voices.

The death scene from "Tristan and Isolde" brought Madame Materna back to our concert platform after a long lapse of years. It is pleasant to be able to say that time has dealt gently with the singer. A trifle of explosive force instead of sustained power, a slight inequality in middle register, that is all that the severest critic is able to animadvert upon, and against this one must balance a perfect understanding of the music, an artistic intelligence of highest rank and years of earnest service to art rather than to mammon. The ensemble was excellent, and the surety of the singer led to a sense of security on the part of the audience that added not a little to the enjoyment of the number. The heartiest enthusiasm followed the conclusion of the work, and Mme. Materna was recalled with most spontaneous applause. The orchestra did excellently, both in this and the prelude leading up to it.

The "Siegfried Idyl," which followed, proves two points definitely—firstly, Wagner was able to present his ideas with a small orchestra when necessary. The intertwining of the two phrases, "Siegfried, treasure of the world," and the "Peace-theme," is a great effect, although produced by simple means and slight orchestral resources. Secondly, one finds in this a complete refutation of Rowbotham's statement that Wagner did not actually believe in his own theories, for here, in a work intended only for the family circle, a composition celebrating his wife and son, we find all the essential theories put in practice. The Germans have playfully called this work "Treppemusik" ("stairway-music") because it was first performed on the stairway leading to Madame Wagner's chamber in Villa Tribschen near Luzerne. That the sense of the work may be fully comprehended a translation of Wagner's poem, which he gave to his wife just before the performance, (which took place on her birthday) is appended:—

Thy sacrifices have shed blessings o'er me,
And to my work have given noble aim.
In the dark hour of conflict they upheld me,
Until my labor reached a sturdy frame.

Oft in the land of legends we were dreaming,
Those legends which contain the Teuton's fame,
Until a son upon our lives was beaming;
Siegfried, must be our youthful hero's name.

For him and thee in tones I now am praising,
What thanks for deeds of love could better be?

Within our souls the grateful song upraising
Which in this music I have now set free.

Within its cadence I have held united Siegfried, our dearly cherished son, and thee,
And all the harmonies I now am bringing.
But speak the thought which in my heart is ringing.

There has never been a better performance of the "Faust Overture" than was given upon this occasion. Probably no subject in poetry has been set to music so frequently as the great poem by Goethe, and the diverse treatments could scarcely be described in a volume. Gounod's and Wagner's treatments of the theme mark the extreme limits, and are in a degree opposites. Gounod discarded all the philosophical part of the work, and made the love episode with Gretchen the central point of his endeavor, so that in Germany his opera is not unjustly called "Margarethe;" Wagner renounced the feminine element altogether and gave a philosophical tone-picture of Faust, the self-tormenting, the yearner after the infinite. Begun in the dark days of Wagner's early Parisian experiences, in 1840, one can readily imagine that the poet's line,

"Forego thou must, thou must forego," would speak with especial force to his imagination, and this would seem to give the keynote to the imagination better than the motto which Wagner attached to it when he rewrote the work in Zurich fifteen years later. This motto is:—

Der Gott der mir in Busen wohnt,
Kann tief mein Innerstes erregen;
Der ueber allen meinen Kraeften thront,
Er kann nach aussen nichts bewegen,
Und so ist mir das Dasein eine Last,
Der Tod erwuenscht, das Leben mir verhasst
The last lines

And so I live on, weary of my breath,
Yet life I hate, and wish and long for Death, are, however, palpably present even from the first remarkable phrase upon the contrabasses and tuba.

The Siegfried funeral march is not so definitely a march as a Bardic recital of history. The orchestra tells the story of Siegfried's life and death. Chopin's funeral march may be the noblest specimen of its school upon the piano. Beethoven's heroic symphony may present what Coleridge called "A funeral march in purple," but this Wagnerian reproduction of ancient heroic recital overtops all the mortuary music ever written, in fitness to the situation, in grandeur of conception, in sublimity of working-out. Every leit-motif was given with clearness, so that the tale lost nothing in the telling.

Every number of the programme was well chosen, so that Wagner was heard in many different moods, and no effect of monotony was produced. No better ending to the concert could have been found than the finale to the "Götterdämmerung." What a bold departure from old usage it is in itself! No chorus standing around with perfunctory expressions of stereotyped woe, no grouping of the chief singers for a tour de force, but the expression of mortal sorrow from a woman that had been immortal, a climax of grief without weakness. The writer recalls a performance of this finale by this same artist at Villa Wahnfried on the day after the first performance of "The Mastersingers" in Bayreuth; Mottl was at the piano, Stavenhagen, Lamoureux, Prince

172
Alexander of Hesse, and a whole host of the Wagnerian inner circle were among the auditors; then and there Materna made that number her own by right of conquest, almost by right of discovery, for she brought a heroism into it that one could not realize from the score. At the concert of Saturday there was something of this heroism, much was achieved, and yet more suggested, and it was a worthy tribute to a veteran in Wagner's music, the lingering of the audience after the last number of the programme, to recall the singer (and the conductor, too) again and again.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Wagner Music Sung and Played at the Symphony—Benefit Concerts Tonight—Other Events.

The program of yesterday's symphony concert, the 11th of this season, was composed entirely of selections from the writings of Richard Wagner, as follows: Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," in C major; prelude and "Isolde's Love-death," from "Tristan and Isolde;" a Siegfried idyl, in E major; a Faust overture, in D minor; Siegfried's Funeral march, from "Gotterdammerung," act 3, scene 2; Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Gotterdammerung," act 3, scene 3.

The soloist was Mme Amalia Materna, a singer who has often won praises here in the past for admirable interpretation of Wagner music.

The audience was one of the largest of the season at the Friday afternoon rehearsal as well as at last night's concert. It is notable that the attendance is always increased when a vocal soloist is to be heard, which would indicate that the exceeding popularity of director Paur would be even greater were he to more frequently have vocalists upon his programs.

The playing of the orchestra yesterday was so generally excellent that it is unnecessary to single out any one selection for special praise. Each was played with superb effect; no more forcible, intelligent or sympathetic reading of Wagner's writings has ever been given by this orchestra. It is very gratifying to note that the Boston symphony orchestra's past standard of excellence has not only been maintained, but has actually improved under Mr Paur's direction.

Yesterday's program may have seemed rather heavy to many in the audience, and it could have been wished that some of the German master's earlier and more melodious compositions had been included in the selections, but everybody must have enjoyed the work of orchestra and soloist.

Mme Materna's robust personality and resonant voice is well adapted to interpreting the weighty music with which Wagner has laden his dramas. Very few singers would be able to hold their own against the volume of tone brought forth by the heartiest efforts of 60 symphony orchestra players. That Mme Materna's voice could be heard above all was evidence of the splendid vigor of her vocal organs. Her voice is of excellent quality, a clear soprano of good range and remarkable power. In the recitative passages the words were clearly enunciated and sung with much dramatic effect. There will be no public rehearsal or concert this week. For the concert on Jan 20 the program will be: Suite in B minor, Bach; Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn; overture, "King Lear," Berlioz.

The symphony programme last night was wholly Wagnerian and wholly satisfactory from the opening "Meistersinger Prelude" to the grandly dramatic "Brunnhilde's dying speech" in the concluding number, from the Gotterdammerung. The selections are all too well known to call for analysis or criticism. To criticize Wagner, indeed, seems today almost sacrilegious, standing as he does, a god among composers. To the performance of his work only words of praise can be given, viewing it "by and large." The new conductor is rapidly acquiring the perfect control of his men which is necessary to a fluent and coherent translation of great musical thought, and the orchestra already shows the strong influence of a strong leadership. Few performances since Mr. Gericke's reign have been so distinctly animated by a dominating virility as that of the "Funeral Music," for instance. The brasses were occasionally a bit energetic and there were intermittent roughnesses in the double basses, in the Prelude from the Meistersingers, but they were not strongly marked defects, and the vigorous direction of Mr. Paur quickly made itself felt. Madame Materna, the famous Wagnerian soprano, reappeared in Boston at this and the Friday concert, for the first times in several years, and was received with a warmth of welcome that deepened into enthusiasm after her noble rendering of the Isolde music (the Love-death). Her voice retains its breadth and richness and her dramatic feeling conveys every shade of sentiment in that most exquisite love song which shows Wagner to have been as true a poet as musician. In the Brunnhilde music her singing was superbly dramatic, thrillingly intense; but here the orchestra may be gravely criticised for forgetting the singer at times and playing with an unrestrained fervor in which only the voice of a steam calliope could hold its own. Indeed this was the one serious blemish of the performance.

It is interesting to watch the conductor as he sways his potent baton. Every nerve is tense with feeling, every fibre thrills with the music spell. No cool, impassive man is here, with calm, intellectual deliberation, seeking "effects," but a musician with brain, soul and body all on fire with the music and intent only on uttering what it says to him. Mr. Paur is evidently a rarely gifted director and with the superb body of musicians under his control there is no limit to the musical possibilities of the next few years.

RENE S. PARKS.

MUSIC AND DRAMA. Jan 14/94

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Hans von Bülow once conducted a Brahms symphony in one of the German capitals. It evoked so little applause that at the close he turned towards the audience and said: "Ladies and gentlemen! I think you do not understand this symphony; I will therefore repeat it." And he repeated it. At the close the applause was deafening—for the audience feared still another repetition. May be some such fear caused the audience at Music Hall last evening to applaud so vigorously the last movement of Brahms's first symphony as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the preceding three movements were followed by the faintest applause conceivable at such a gathering. There was, however, another reason why that last movement should have been so well received. Not only was it remarkably well played, under Mr. Paur's direction, but it is well known that its thematic material is boldly stolen from the Hymn of Joy in Beethoven's last symphony. Give Brahms a good musical idea and he never fails to be interesting; the trouble is that he very rarely has any definite, tangible ideas of his own. We have heard that first symphony at least twenty times, and at every repetition we are more disagreeably affected by its ugly orchestration, its dryness, and its utter lack of melodic charm and originality. Brahms is usually supposed to be very deep, but as a matter of fact he is extremely shallow. He is a sort of musical Hegel, whose bombastic, pretentious style and wordiness give the impression that there must be a deep meaning behind it all; but in truth it is nothing but words, words, words. Brahms, however, has his ardent champions, just as Hummel had in his day. These champions are erudite, but their sense of humor is not always keen. One of them, for instance, in speaking of that stolen theme, says: "One cannot call it plagiarism; it is two men saying the same thing." Here is solid comfort for pilferers and pirates!

Fortunately there were better things on Mr. Paur's programme—although it may be remarked here that, for some obscure reason, the Brooklyn programmes of the Boston Orchestra are always better than those made up for New York. Mme. Nordica has never appeared to better advantage than she did last evening in arias from "Fidelio" and from Massenet's "Herodiade." Her beautiful voice and refined style made so deep an impression on the audience that she was clamorously recalled half-a-dozen times.

173
Weber's magnificent "Euryanthe" overture came between the two vocal numbers, and the concluding number was Tchaikovsky's stirring martial overture entitled "1812," or "The Holy War." Programme music has never reached a more realistic climax than it does in this glowing piece depicting the routing of Napoleon's army in Russia. As in the Tannhäuser overture the pilgrims' chorus contends with the Venus music, so here the Marseillaise clashes with Russian themes, but is finally engulfed and annihilated by the victorious strains of the Czar's national hymn, amid the din of full orchestra, reinforced by bells. It is noisy, but it is stirring, and not inartistic, and one can easily fancy how difficult it must be for a Russian audience to restrain itself from rising and shouting when suddenly, at the close, the victorious Russian national hymn resounds. This piece will never be popular in Paris.

Mr. Emil Paur reminds me of the man commended by the compiler of "The Proverbs;" he is diligent in his business. Unlike his illustrious predecessor, he does not appear to seek constantly notoriety. Paur has not, therefore, a street car fame, and passengers who do not care for music are no longer disturbed by young women discussing the personal appearance of the conductor of the Symphony concerts, conjecturing about his private domestic relations, or inquiring passionately into the possibility of a secret grief. When Mr. Paur appears in public, it is Mr. Paur the musician, not Mr. Paur the man; and when he conducts the orchestra he is evidently more concerned with the composer than with himself.

Mr. Nikisch was a Byronic hero. When Schumann's "Manfred" was given under his direction, he should have read the text as well as swung the stick. It is true, he would not have read as well as Mr. Riddle, but his melancholy pallor, romantic eyes and arrangement of hair would have lent local color as it were.

But Mr. Paur is no Manfred, no Lara. He is an honest, intelligent, experienced German musician, who is performing conscientiously his duty to his employer, to the public and to himself, without personal vanity, without desire to ride triumphantly on the crest of a sensational wave.

I am unacquainted with his habits and his life at Jamaica Plain, but I fancy that, when the symphony concert is over, he goes home and puts on a loose, comfortable jacket, exchanges his boots or pumps for slippers, fills a pipe and enjoys peace and privacy; and I am sure that, before he goes to bed, he looks at his children asleep. For the face of Emil Paur is simple and kindly, as well as intelligent and strong.

172
Alexander of Hesse, and a whole host of the Wagnerian inner circle were among the auditors; then and there Materna made that number her own by right of conquest, almost by right of discovery, for she brought a heroism into it that one could not realize from the score. At the concert of Saturday there was something of this heroism, much was achieved, and yet more suggested, and it was a worthy tribute to a veteran in Wagner's music, the lingering of the audience after the last number of the programme, to recall the singer (and the conductor, too) again and again.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Wagner Music Sung and Played at the Symphony—Benefit Concerts Tonight—Other Events.

The program of yesterday's symphony concert, the 11th of this season, was composed entirely of selections from the writings of Richard Wagner, as follows: Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," in C major; prelude and "Isolde's Love-death," from "Tristan and Isolde;" a Siegfried idyl, in E major; a Faust overture, in D minor; Siegfried's Funeral march, from "Götterdämmerung," act 3, scene 2; Brunnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Götterdämmerung," act 3, scene 3.

The soloist was Mme Amalia Materna, a singer who has often won praises here in the past for admirable interpretation of Wagner music.

The audience was one of the largest of the season at the Friday afternoon rehearsal as well as at last night's concert. It is notable that the attendance is always increased when a vocal soloist is to be heard, which would indicate that the exceeding popularity of director Paur would be even greater were he to more frequently have vocalists upon his programs.

The playing of the orchestra yesterday was so generally excellent that it is unnecessary to single out any one selection for special praise. Each was played with superb effect; no more forcible, intelligent or sympathetic reading of Wagner's writings has ever been given by this orchestra. It is very gratifying to note that the Boston symphony orchestra's past standard of excellence has not only been maintained, but has actually improved under Mr Paur's direction.

Yesterday's program may have seemed rather heavy to many in the audience, and it could have been wished that some of the German master's earlier and more melodious compositions had been included in the selections, but everybody must have enjoyed the work of orchestra and soloist.

Mme Materna's robust personality and resonant voice is well adapted to interpreting the weighty music with which Wagner has laden his dramas. Very few singers would be able to hold their own against the volume of tone brought forth by the heartiest efforts of 60 symphony orchestra players. That Mme Materna's voice could be heard above all was evidence of the splendid vigor of her vocal organs. Her voice is of excellent quality, a clear soprano of good range and remarkable power. In the recitative passages the words were clearly enunciated and sung with much dramatic effect.

There will be no public rehearsal or concert this week. For the concert on Jan 20 the program will be: Suite in B minor, Bach; Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn; overture, "King Lear," Berlioz.

The symphony programme last night was wholly Wagnerian and wholly satisfactory from the opening "Meistersinger Prelude" to the grandly dramatic "Brunnhilde's dying speech" in the concluding number, from the Götterdämmerung. The selections are all too well known to call for analysis or criticism. To criticize Wagner, indeed, seems today almost sacrilegious, standing as he does, a god among composers. To the performance of his work only words of praise can be given, viewing it "by and large." The new conductor is rapidly acquiring the perfect control of his men which is necessary to a fluent and coherent translation of great musical thought, and the orchestra already shows the strong influence of a strong leadership. Few performances since Mr. Gericke's reign have been so distinctly animated by a dominating virility as that of the "Funeral Music," for instance. The brasses were occasionally a bit energetic and there were intermittent roughnesses in the double basses, in the Prelude from the Meistersingers, but they were not strongly marked defects, and the vigorous direction of Mr. Paur quickly made itself felt. Madame Materna, the famous Wagnerian soprano, reappeared in Boston at this and the Friday concert, for the first times in several years, and was received with a warmth of welcome that deepened into enthusiasm after her noble rendering of the Isolde music (the Love-death). Her voice retains its breadth and richness and her dramatic feeling conveys every shade of sentiment in that most exquisite love song which shows Wagner to have been as true a poet as musician. In the Brunnhilde music her singing was superbly dramatic, thrillingly intense; but here the orchestra may be gravely criticised for forgetting the singer at times and playing with an unrestrained fervor in which only the voice of a steam calliope could hold its own. Indeed this was the one serious blemish of the performance.

It is interesting to watch the conductor as he sways his potent baton. Every nerve is tense with feeling, every fibre thrills with the music spell. No cool, impassive man is here, with calm, intellectual deliberation, seeking "effects," but a musician with brain, soul and body all on fire with the music and intent only on uttering what it says to him. Mr. Paur is evidently a rarely gifted director and with the superb body of musicians under his control there is no limit to the musical possibilities of the next few years.

RENE S. PARKS.

MUSIC AND DRAMA. Jan 12/94

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dr. Hans von Bülow once conducted a Brahms symphony in one of the German capitals. It evoked so little applause that at the close he turned towards the audience and said: "Ladies and gentlemen! I think you do not understand this symphony; I will therefore repeat it." And he repeated it. At the close the applause was deafening—for the audience feared still another repetition. May be some such fear caused the audience at Music Hall last evening to applaud so vigorously the last movement of Brahms's first symphony as played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, for the preceding three movements were followed by the faintest applause conceivable at such a gathering. There was, however, another reason why that last movement should have been so well received. Not only was it remarkably well played, under Mr. Paur's direction, but it is well known that its thematic material is boldly stolen from the Hymn of Joy in Beethoven's last symphony. Give Brahms a good musical idea and he never fails to be interesting; the trouble is that he very rarely has any definite, tangible ideas of his own. We have heard that first symphony at least twenty times, and at every repetition we are more disagreeably affected by its ugly orchestration, its dryness, and its utter lack of melodic charm and originality. Brahms is usually supposed to be very deep, but as a matter of fact he is extremely shallow. He is a sort of musical Hegel, whose bombastic, pretentious style and wordiness give the impression that there must be a deep meaning behind it all; but in truth it is nothing but words, words, words. Brahms, however, has his ardent champions, just as Hummel had in his day. These champions are erudite, but their sense of humor is not always keen. One of them, for instance, in speaking of that stolen theme, says: "One cannot call it plagiarism; it is two men saying the same thing." Here is solid comfort for pilferers and pirates!

Fortunately there were better things on Mr. Paur's programme—although it may be remarked here that, for some obscure reason, the Brooklyn programmes of the Boston Orchestra are always better than those made up for New York. Mme. Nordica has never appeared to better advantage than she did last evening in arias from "Fidelio" and from Massenet's "Herodiade." Her beautiful voice and refined style made so deep an impression on the audience that she was clamorously recalled half-a-dozen times.

173
Weber's magnificent "Euryanthe" overture came between the two vocal numbers, and the concluding number was Tchaikovsky's stirring martial overture entitled "1812," or "The Holy War." Programme music has never reached a more realistic climax than it does in this glowing piece depicting the routing of Napoleon's army in Russia. As in the Tannhäuser overture the pilgrims' chorus contends with the Venus music, so here the Marseillaise clashes with Russian themes, but is finally engulfed and annihilated by the victorious strains of the Czar's national hymn, amid the din of full orchestra, reinforced by bells. It is noisy, but it is stirring, and not inartistic, and one can easily fancy how difficult it must be for a Russian audience to restrain itself from rising and shouting when suddenly, at the close, the victorious Russian national hymn resounds. This piece will never be popular in Paris.

Mr. Emil Paur reminds me of the man commended by the compiler of "The Proverbs;" he is diligent in his business. Unlike his illustrious predecessor, he does not appear to seek constantly notoriety. Paur has not, therefore, a street car fame, and passengers who do not care for music are no longer disturbed by young women discussing the personal appearance of the conductor of the Symphony concerts, conjecturing about his private domestic relations, or inquiring passionately into the possibility of a secret grief. When Mr. Paur appears in public, it is Mr. Paur the musician, not Mr. Paur the man; and when he conducts the orchestra he is evidently more concerned with the composer than with himself.

Mr. Nikisch was a Byronic hero. When Schumann's "Manfred" was given under his direction, he should have read the text as well as swung the stick. It is true, he would not have read as well as Mr. Riddle, but his melancholy pallor, romantic eyes and arrangement of hair would have lent local color as it were.

But Mr. Paur is no Manfred, no Lara. He is an honest, intelligent, experienced German musician, who is performing conscientiously his duty to his employer, to the public and to himself, without personal vanity, without desire to ride triumphantly on the crest of a sensational wave.

I am unacquainted with his habits and his life at Jamaica Plain, but I fancy that, when the symphony concert is over, he goes home and puts on a loose, comfortable jacket, exchanges his boots or pumps for slippers, fills a pipe and enjoys peace and privacy; and I am sure that, before he goes to bed, he looks at his children asleep. For the face of Emil Paur is simple and kindly, as well as intelligent and strong.

Paur and the Matinee Girl.

It is true that there is a great variety of opinions entertained by the self-wise ones of the body fashionable that attend the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in regard to the "correctness" (according to their estimates of that quality) of the new conductor Herr Emil Paur. While some reject him, and others accept him on the grounds of tolerant indifference, and others are not quite sure of their own minds in the matter, but are willing to take the new comer on probation, the most disappointed "Athenian" of all, according to accuated observation, is that type of femininity, "so fearfully and wonderfully made," known as the Boston matinee girl. Upon this phase of the new symphonic dispensation a writer in the American Art Journal, after alluding to the fact that Herr Paur was a fellow student of Nikisch and Felix Mottl, at Vienna, that he had been a conductor at Cassel where once the great Dr. Spohr reigned supreme; and had also been a knight of the baton at Konigsberg, at Manheim and at Leipsic, at all of which places his professional efforts were attended with a full measure of success and honor, says:

"But such information did not go far toward satisfying the heart-hunger of that marvellous production of nature—not unassisted by art—the Boston Symphony matinee girl. Was the new conductor handsome? Was he blessed with a seraphic countenance, suggestive of an oatmeal diet and early death? Was he not at least poetic and esthetic? Did he have soulful hands? And did his clothes fit him? What were twenty-thousand "readings," if he were to turn out to be short, rotund and prone to limpness of the collar?

It is not likely that the matinee girl will soon recover from the dreadful shock which struck her emotional centre when Emil Paur stepped upon the stage of the Boston Music Hall for the first time. If ever there was a plain, prosaic, "hofcapelmeister" looking conductor, it is Paur. He is not especially short, nor does he run far toward globularity, but his architecture is severely Doric. His hair is dingy brown—long, of course—and his face is conspicuous by reason of the prominence of the cheekbones and the length of his lower jaw. Paur is not pretty to look at.

As for his manner of conducting, it is certainly rigorous. His down beat is full of conscious rectitude, and the relations of the other beats to it are sanctified by the fundamental truths of trigonometry. It is certain that the remark of Little Buttercup about Dick Deadeye may be fairly applied to the new conductor: 'He is a little triangular.' Alas for the palpitating matinee girl! No more graceful curves that seemed to wave the music out of the air as though they were the summonses of a magician's wand; nothing now but a cold, intellectual, accurately-measured beat, for which, perhaps, the members of the orchestra are in secret profoundly grateful. For a good, intelligible beat, with the weight of head, hands, arms, back, and directorial solemnity behind it, has this one admirable quality; it will keep an orchestra acquainted with the conductor's wishes as to tempo."

No, the matinee girl cannot so easily relinquish her little dapper directorial divinity who used to perch upon a telescope arrangement of platforms when he conducted; who used to wear his fore-hair a la bang; pose, and twirl his moustach whenever a short wait occurred, and rest his left hand by thrusting the thumb thereof into the side pocket of his irreproachable pants. No, she cannot forget her idolized ideal.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 20, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BACH.

SUITE No. 2, in B minor, for STRING ORCHESTRA and FLUTE.

- I. Overture.—Largo.—Allegro.—Largo.
- II. Rondeau.
- III. Sarabande.
- IV. Bourrée I., alternately.—Bourrée.
- V. Polonaise.
- VI. Double.
- VII. Badinerie.

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE. to "Coriolan," in C minor, op. 62.

MENDELSSOHN-BARTHOLDY. SYMPHONY No. 3, in A minor, (Scotch.) op. 56.

- I. Introduction: Andante con moto.—Allegro un poco agitato.
- II. Vivace non troppo.
- III. Adagio.
- IV. Allegro vivacissimo.—Allegro maestoso assai.

BERLIOZ.

OVERTURE to "King Lear." in C major, op. 4.

THE TWELFTH SYMPHONY.

The Work of the Orchestra Evidences the Admirable Skill of the Director.

The 12th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place Saturday evening in Music Hall. The following numbers were performed:

Suite No. 2, in B minor.....Bach
Overture to "Coriolan".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, in A minor (Scotch), Mendelssohn
Overture to "King Lear".....Berlioz

This programme, which was quite in contrast to that of the preceding concert, was played with fine effect. The orchestra seems to have become rehabilitated under the admirable conducting of Mr. Paur. The loose, slovenly manner that was so dominant a feature under Mr. Nikisch, has entirely disappeared, and the work of the orchestra is fast approaching the precision and general excellence that made this superb body of musicians so famous under the conducting of that eminent leader, Wilhelm Gericke. The Bach suite, which gets really monotonous during the one half hour interval that it lasts in its performance, was finely rendered by the orchestra, its polyphony being brought out with remarkable clearness, while the character of each movement was well marked and a happy degree of contrast obtained, thereby producing all possible effect in the rendering. The tutti flute passages were played by three flutes in unison, and the solo passages were artistically rendered by Mr. Mole. The audience warmly applauded its performance.

There has never been heard a more noble and exalted interpretation of Beethoven in Music Hall than the playing of the "Coriolan" overture on this occasion. Mr. Paur's conception of Beethoven commands the highest praise. It is a good index of the purity of his taste, and is an indication of the depth of musical feeling that he possesses. Equally commendable was his reading of the Mendelssohn symphony.

Mr. Paur showed at a previous concert, when the "Romeo and Juliet" selection of Berlioz was given, that he was master of this great French composer's manner, and so one was prepared for a fine rendering of the "King Lear" overture on Saturday night, although the composition is not one of the better of its fanciful author's works.

The playing of this overture was a most excellent performance on the part of the orchestra, if we except the infernal pounding of the drums. But then, as Mr. Paur has now the orchestra in his grip, it is chargeable upon him that the drummer is allowed to create such a din.

Mr. Paur should also see to it that this Ajax of the sheepskins should have more regard for the normal diapason. In the "King Lear" overture the tympani has much important work to do, and it is as necessary that the drums should be correctly tuned as that the other instruments should be. But this disturber of the peace defied the directions of Berlioz, and instead of having his upper drum tuned to the pitch of C, had screwed it up to C sharp nearly, and oblivious to the discord he created, revelled in his herculean efforts.

Of course this fury and false intonation have ruled for the past three or four seasons, but then no matter how coarse the performance or how badly out of tune anything was, it never seemed to disturb Mr. Nikisch. We have, however, a more exalted idea of Mr. Paur's direction as well as his acuteness in the matter of correct musical pitch. If this percussion thunderbolt could hear the curses that are heaped upon his head he would modify his gymnastic exhibitions. Let him learn to tune his drums first, and then, Mr. Paur, please make him draw it milder, and thereby receive the blessing of a large number of listeners who cannot understand this incongruity upon your part, who otherwise are so sensitively musical, evidently. Yesterday's Courier administered a deserved rebuke to this pounding nuisance.

The concert next Saturday evening will present the following programme: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concertstück, Weber; Symphony No. 4, Schumann; Spanish rhapsody, Liszt; Rakoczy March, Berlioz. The soloist will be Mr. F. Busoni. WARREN DAVENPORT.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twelfth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Bach: Suite No. 2, in B minor, for strings and flute.
Beethoven: Overture to "Coriolan," Opus 62.
Mendelssohn: Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch"), Opus 56.
Berlioz: Overture to "Le Roi Léal," Opus 4.

It is so good to hear almost anything by Sebastian Bach that, when one of his works figures on a programme, one inclines somewhat to take it as a gift horse, not to be looked in the mouth. Yet there are considerations which should not quite be passed over in silence. A whole suite by Bach, whether for pianoforte or orchestra, is a pretty large dose to take at once. With all that is great and immortal in the master's works, there are also things in them which time and the development of music since his day have thrown into obsolescence; and even the sincerest Bach lover, perhaps he more than anyone else, ought to wish these things wholly obsolete, buried for good and all. We should not forget one important element in the relations between his music and the public—the enormous leisureliness of life, both social and artistic, in his day, compared with the push and bustle of our modern life. His was the time when people could stand, and were glad to enjoy, huge doses of one and the same thing; they had time and to spare, and no doubt a good deal of it lay heavy on their hands; the comparative absence of acute excitement from their lives made them proportionately impervious to boredom; two-hour sermons, well-nigh endless arias, suites of seven or eight numbers all in the same key, did not make them think of yawning. But we of today are otherwise constituted; we cannot well stand so much of the same thing at a sitting; our artistic sense craves more variety and contrast. We may take just as keen delight in a Bach aria as listeners did a hundred years ago; but enough is as good as a feast, and we resent that eternal Da capo, in which a long first part is repeated without variation. We cut down Bach's and Handel's Da capo nowadays to its smallest practicable limits, and with no injury either to the form or spirit of their airs.

In the same way, a suite of seven or eight pieces, connected together by no link of internal musical necessity, no one of them growing out of nor ideally developed from any of the others, and all of them in the same key—this sort of thing is a direct slap in the face, not only to our present musical habits, but to our highest and best musical instincts. It is the musical counterpart of the old two-hour sermon; we do not enjoy it. We remember one of the most ardent, whole-souled and enlightened Bach-lovers the world ever knew, saying one day that he "could imagine no more infernal bore than listening to the whole of a Bach suite at a sitting." And what a high-priest of the Bach-cult rejects as too much is hardly wholesome food for the musical public at large. Of the seven numbers composing the B minor suite Mr. Paur cut out the minuet (one page of full score); but he gave all the rest unflinchingly, and it certainly was too much of a good thing. Three numbers would have been enough.

Another consideration of unspeakable importance in the present case is the condition in which Bach left his scores. The continuo of the B minor suite is very elaborately figured all through, showing that every number was intended by the composer to have an organ or clavichord accompaniment. In some places an accompaniment in full harmony is absolutely indispensable; passages here and there in the fugue of the first movement, in the second bourrée and the whole double of the polonaise need to be filled out. The suite was given without any accompaniment whatever, the bare places above referred to sounding as unlike Bach as possible. Otherwise the plan on which the suite was given—with two and sometimes three flutes to counterbalance the large mass of strings—was excellent. The performance was in general rather rough and lacking in finish, at times vacillating; Mr. Molé played the flute solo in the double of the polonaise beautifully, but the effect of that duet between flute and basses, without any middle parts, was too bare to make the movement enjoyable.

The "Coriolan" overture, too, was given without much real effectiveness, and not always quite clearly; those strong, nervous passages in dotted quarters and eighths where the violins and violas follow the 'celli and double basses at half a beat's distance, did not "register" exactly, as the chromo lithographers say, and did not give the ear the definite impression of groups of four eighth-notes.

The ever beautiful "Scotch" symphony was given very effectively indeed, if, like the rest of the programme, somewhat roughly; one seldom found in it that beauty of tone that comes legitimately from Mendelssohn's orchestration. But the tempi were, one and all, admirably taken and the performance full of fire and spirit.

Berlioz's "Roi Léal" overture missed fire almost completely; for one thing, the second theme—as also the second theme in the "Coriolan"—seemed to us taken decidedly too slow. Has the modern slow cantilena become so naturalized here that we are never to hear a passionate second theme again?

The next programme is: Weber, overture to "Euryanthe;" Weber, Concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, opus 79; Schumann, symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120; Liszt, Spanish rhapsody, arranged for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni; Berlioz, Rakóczy March, from "La Damnation de Faust." Mr. F. Busoni will be the pianist.

loist:

BUSONI.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert— Glimpses of "Tobasco."

The Cecilia's Concert—The Opera Season—George Grossmith's Return—The Graham Entertainment This Evening—Slivinski's Second Recital—The West Point Band—News Notes.

With Bach at the top, Berlioz at the bottom and Mendelssohn and Beethoven for the filling, there was no lack of variety in last evening's Symphony concert programme. The new director, Emil Paur, is somewhat uneven in his success at programme making, but upon this occasion he succeeded in arranging a list of works which appealed with equal success to many classes of music lovers.

The Bach suite No. 2 in B minor, for strings and flute, introduced the evening's selections, and its several short movements were played with splendid precision and taste under the baton of Mr. Paur. In the playing of the string section of the band it was manifest that the conductor has succeeded in bringing back to these players much of the precision which characterized their work under Herr Gericke, and at the same time retaining the freedom of the Nikisch regime. The grand body of tone given out by the strings told with great effect in the stronger movements of the suite, and there was a delicacy and refinement in the performance of the work which was very delightful. M. Mole, master of the flute that he is, has never done better work than on this occasion, and although there was something of monotony in the seven movements, they were at all times enjoyable and thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan," in C minor, made the next work on the list, and the dramatic characteristics of the composition were fairly brought out in its performance.

The symphony No. 3 of Mendelssohn (Scotch) made the principal feature of the programme, and the reading given this work, while being thoroughly conservative and in keeping with the traditions of its earlier performances here, was full of interest to even those to whom it was a familiar composition. The adagio was especially effective as played on this occasion, and the brilliant allegro vivacissimo was also a strikingly enjoyable portion of the symphony. The grand finale was played in the broad style that gave all its characteristics with splendid effect, and made a marked impression upon the audience.

The overture to "King Lear" by Berlioz ended this most admirably arranged programme, and in the performance of the series of tone pictures so grandly portrayed by the composer Mr. Paur displayed the abilities of his orchestra in a fine fashion. Altogether, the programme was decidedly one of the best of the season.

Next week Mr. F. Busoni, the pianist, will be the soloist, and will play the Weber concertstuck and Liszt's Spanish rhapsody. The programme will also include the "Euryanthe" overture, Schumann's fourth symphony and the Rakoczy march.

Echoes from the Twelfth Symphony Program—Sunday Musical Offerings—Notes.

The 12th symphony concert at Music Hall began with Bach's suite in B minor for strings and flute, and late comers were obliged to wait in the lobby nearly half an hour until the seven numbers comprising the composition were finished before they could gain admission to the hall, conductor Paur evidently not wishing to mar the performance of the delicate work by the bustle and confusion of belated ones. The unfortunates missed a delightful interpretation of the dainty composition which, beginning with a stately introduction, impressively performed by Mr Paur's men, leads up to the free and livelier rondeau and dance measures of the sarabande, bourree, polonaise and minuet. The work of the strings and flute calls for high commendation. In the fourth movement and the finale of the fifth the flute phrasing was specially effective.

Mendelssohn's famous and familiar "Scotch" symphony was finely played. Probably it never has had a more artistic or smoother performance in this city. The wealth of minor details was not overshadowed by the broad treatment of the fortissimo passages, and the development of themes by the different contingents was refreshingly crisp and harmonious.

The second movement, with its merry bagpipe dance, was a capital illustration of musical humor, which brought smiles to the faces of the men and the conductor as well as to the auditors. The spontaneous applause which greeted this number evidenced the hearty appreciation of the audience.

Beethoven's passionate "Coriolan" overture was given with due regard to its dramatic character, and the Berlioz overture to "King Lear," which closed the concert, was also played with the proper stormy effects. The program this week will be as follows: "Weber, overture, "Euryanthe;" Weber, concertstuck; Schumann, symphony in D minor, No. 4; Liszt, Spanish rhapsody; Berlioz, Rakoczy march. Mr F. Busoni will be the soloist.

Shakespeare found his way from the theatres to the Music Hall last night, where he was represented on the twelfth Symphony programme by two overtures dedicated to him—the "Coriolanus" of Beethoven, and the "King Lear" of Berlioz. Although these were separated by the symphony, the choice of them was not felicitous. For in spite of a certain rude majesty in the first announcements of the latter, its strain of pathos, and its wild and confused imagining and furious tides of conflict, it cannot help appearing theatrical and artificial beside the mighty humanity and spirituality of the former. Beethoven must have taken the hard contests, the ephemeral hopes, the bitter disillusionings, the cruel fatalities and the dire defeat of the great Roman greatly to heart; for his music throbs and swells, groans and sighs, all pathetically with the emotions which belong to a life so harassed, deceived and wrecked. All its pages are instinct with reality, and no fancy is needed to find in them the significance for a strong nature, inured to battle in strange lands, longing with a disappointed yearning for peace and home, forced into uncongenial toils, driven from itself, and finally seeking rest in the cold stillness of death and the silence of sorrow. The hold of this music is not to be released slightly; and if Mr. Paur had sought to belittle the Berlioz overture,—which when considered apart showed many touches of genius,—he could scarcely have done this more efficiently than by placing it on the same programme with the incomparable "Coriolanus." Its place should have been given to some light and brilliant overture, such as "Fra Dylavolo," or "Zampa." This would have brightened away the sombreness and pathos of Beethoven, and relieved also the effect of the symphony, which was Mendelssohn's "Italian," long so familiar to Boston after more hearings than a foreigner can be made easily to believe possible in a community outside of Germany.

The concert was not well begun, either, for twenty-odd minutes of a Bach suite, comprising seven numbers, every one of which is in the same not exactly cheerful key of B-minor, is by no means a lightsome entertainment in itself. For its monotony wearies ear and spirit, and unfits them to receive attentively and with pleasure what may come next in order. The occasional freshening of the score by the addition of three flutes, which generally play in unison, is helpful—but only to about the same extent as the asphyxiating auditor in the hall is revived when somebody passes through a door and lets in two second's worth of new air.

The injudiciousness of the programme had one mitigating circumstance—it was pretty soon over, the proper ninety minutes not being exceeded. The reading and playing were good and commended at many points with substantial applause.

Whether the approbation which followed the suite were because an end had at last come to its apparently interminable meandering or because being Bach, the well-behaved did not dare to applaud, one would like to be informed. Probably the latter reason counted for something, because there are people who profess to be musical who still dwell under the shadow of the influence of Otto Dresel and the Bach Choir. But before leaving the concert we cannot help reiterating that Mr. Paur does himself small credit in allowing such coarse violence to the kettle-drums, which are constantly operated (one cannot say played) not as instruments of mere emphasis, but as obstreperous, selfish and monstrous overriders of sense and proportion. From their very position they dominate all the band, and the enforcement of their loud clangor by inconsistent and egotistic muscularity is a shame and a deformity.

For Saturday evening next the programme offers no originality whatsoever. The orchestra will play Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Schumann's fourth symphony and Berlioz's "Rakoczy" march, which was long ago relegated to brass bands and popular concerts. Mr. F. Busoni, the pianist, will be the soloist. He, too, promises no addition to the stock of musical knowledge or entertainment, except so far as his mere performance goes, for he has chosen Weber's "Concertstuck" and Liszt's "Spanish" rhapsody. Conit

The Symphony Concert. Scout

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, were: Suite in B-minor, for string orchestra and flute, Bach; overture, "Coriolan," Beethoven; Symphony No. 3, (Scotch) Mendelssohn; Overture, "King Lear," Berlioz. The Bach Suite is very interesting but a steady half hour of B-minor makes a severe trial of one's musical orthodoxy, especially in an era when even the merest tyro of an ambitious song writer thinks it crassly conventional to remain in his original key after the second bar of his tune. The suite was beautifully played; in fact, the whole programme was given in a perfect manner. The orchestra was never in a more perfect condition, even under Mr. Gericke. The mischief that Mr. Nikisch worked with it has been wholly remedied, and its playing is always satisfying and delightful. It was a pleasure to hear the Beethoven overture again, freed from the sickly sentimental affectations that the late conductor foisted on it. The reading was dramatic, without exaggeration, and was brilliant, dignified and finely colored. There was no attempt to make the music say more than it said plainly and clearly. The symphony received a clean cut, sympathetic and honest reading, the second movement in particular being given with fascinating grace and piquancy. The "Lear" overture was broadly and effectively interpreted. The work, however, seems to have aged since we last heard it. At the next concert will be given: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concertstuck, Weber; Symphony, D-minor, Schumann; Spanish Rhapsody, Liszt; "Rakoczy" March, Berlioz. Mr. F. Busoni is the soloist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert — Glimpses of "Tobasco."

The Cecilia's Concert—The Opera Season—George Grossmith's Return—The Graham Entertainment This Evening—Slivinski's Second Recital—The West Point Band—News Notes.

With Bach at the top, Berlioz at the bottom, and Mendelssohn and Beethoven for the filling, there was no lack of variety in last evening's Symphony concert programme. The new director, Emil Paur, is somewhat uneven in his success at programme making, but upon this occasion he succeeded in arranging a list of works which appealed with equal success to many classes of music lovers.

The Bach suite No. 2 in B minor, for strings and flute, introduced the evening's selections, and its several short movements were played with splendid precision and taste under the baton of Mr. Paur. In the playing of the string section of the band it was manifest that the conductor has succeeded in bringing back to these players much of the precision which characterized their work under Herr Gericke, and at the same time retaining the freedom of the Nikisch regime. The grand body of tone given out by the strings told with great effect in the stronger movements of the suite, and there was a delicacy and refinement in the performance of the work which was very delightful. M. Mole, master of the flute that he is, has never done better work than on this occasion, and although there was something of monotony in the seven movements, they were at all times enjoyable and thoroughly appreciated by the audience.

Beethoven's overture to "Coriolan," in C minor, made the next work on the list, and the dramatic characteristics of the composition were fairly brought out in its performance.

The symphony No. 3 of Mendelssohn (Scotch) made the principal feature of the programme, and the reading given this work, while being thoroughly conservative and in keeping with the traditions of its earlier performances here, was full of interest to even those to whom it was a familiar composition. The adagio was especially effective as played on this occasion, and the brilliant allegro vivacissimo was also a strikingly enjoyable portion of the symphony. The grand finale was played in the broad style that gave all its characteristics with splendid effect, and made a marked impression upon the audience.

The overture to "King Lear" by Berlioz ended this most admirably arranged programme, and in the performance of the series of tone pictures so grandly portrayed by the composer Mr. Paur displayed the abilities of his orchestra in a fine fashion. Altogether, the programme was decidedly one of the best of the season.

Next week Mr. F. Busoni, the pianist, will be the soloist, and will play the Weber concertstuck and Liszt's Spanish rhapsody. The programme will also include the "Euryanthe" overture, Schumann's fourth symphony and the Rakoczy march.

Echoes from the Twelfth Symphony Program—Sunday Musical Offerings—Notes.

The 12th symphony concert at Music Hall began with Bach's suite in B minor for strings and flutes, and late comers were obliged to wait in the lobby nearly half an hour until the seven numbers comprising the composition were finished before they could gain admission to the hall, conductor Paur evidently not wishing to mar the performance of the delicate work by the bustle and confusion of belated ones. The unfortunate missed a delightful interpretation of the dainty composition which, beginning with a stately introduction, impressively performed by Mr. Paur's men, leads up to the free and livelier rondeau and dance measures of the sarabande, bourree, polonaise and minuet. The work of the strings and flute calls for high commendation. In the fourth movement and the finale of the fifth the flute phrasing was specially effective.

Mendelssohn's famous and familiar "Scotch" symphony was finely played. Probably it never has had a more artistic or smoother performance in this city. The wealth of minor details was not overshadowed by the broad treatment of the fortissimo passages, and the development of themes by the different contingents was refreshingly crisp and harmonious.

The second movement, with its merry bagpipe dance, was a capital illustration of musical humor, which brought smiles to the faces of the men and the conductor as well as to the auditors. The spontaneous applause which greeted this number evidenced the hearty appreciation of the audience.

Beethoven's passionate "Coriolan" overture was given with due regard to its dramatic character, and the Berlioz overture to "King Lear," which closed the concert, was also played with the proper stormy effects. The program this week will be as follows: "Weber, overture, "Euryanthe;" Weber, concertstuck; Schumann, symphony in D minor, No. 4; Liszt, Spanish rhapsody; Berlioz, Rakoczy march. Mr. F. Busoni will be the soloist.

Shakespeare found his way from the theatres to the Music Hall last night, where he was represented on the twelfth Symphony programme by two overtures dedicated to him—the "Coriolanus" of Beethoven, and the "King Lear" of Berlioz. Although these were separated by the symphony, the choice of them was not felicitous. For in spite of a certain rude majesty in the first announcements of the latter, its strain of pathos, and its wild and confused imagining and furious tides of conflict, it cannot help appearing theatrical and artificial beside the mighty humanity and spirituality of the former. Beethoven must have taken the hard contests, the ephemeral hopes, the bitter disillusionings, the cruel fatalities and the dire defeat of the great Roman greatly to heart; for his music throbs and swells, groans and sighs, all pathetically with the emotions which belong to a life so harassed, deceived and wrecked. All its pages are instinct with reality, and no fancy is needed to find in them the significance for a strong nature, inured to battle in strange lands, longing with a disappointed yearning for peace and home, forced into uncongenial toils, driven from itself, and finally seeking rest in the cold stillness of death and the silence of sorrow. The hold of this music is not to be released slightly; and if Mr. Paur had sought to belittle the Berlioz overture,—which when considered apart showed many touches of genius,—he could scarcely have done this more efficiently than by placing it on the same programme with the incomparable "Coriolanus." Its place should have been given to some light and brilliant overture, such as "Fra Diavolo," or "Zampa." This would have brightened away the sombreness and pathos of Beethoven, and relieved also the effect of the symphony, which was Mendelssohn's "Italian," long so familiar to Boston after more hearings than a foreigner can be made easily to believe possible in a community outside of Germany.

The concert was not well begun, either, for twenty-odd minutes of a Bach suite, comprising seven numbers, every one of which is in the same not exactly cheerful key of B-minor, is by no means a lightsome entertainment in itself. For its monotony wearies ear and spirit, and unfits them to receive attentively and with pleasure what may come next in order. The occasional freshening of the score by the addition of three flutes, which generally play in unison, is helpful—but only to about the same extent as the asphyxiating auditor in the hall is revived when somebody passes through a door and lets in two second's worth of new air.

The injudiciousness of the programme had one mitigating circumstance—it was pretty soon over, the proper ninety minutes not being exceeded. The reading and playing were good and commended at many points with substantial applause.

Whether the approbation which followed the suite were because an end had at last come to its apparently interminable meandering or because being Bach, the well-behaved did not dare to applaud, one would like to be informed. Probably the latter reason counted for something, because there are people who profess to be musical who still dwell under the shadow of the influence of Otto Dresel and the Bach Choir. But before leaving the concert we cannot help reiterating that Mr. Paur does himself small credit in allowing such coarse violence to the kettle-drums, which are constantly operated (one cannot say played) not as instruments of mere emphasis, but as obstreperous, selfish and monstrous overriders of sense and proportion. From their very position they dominate all the band, and the enforcement of their loud clangor by inconsistent and egotistic muscularity is a shame and a deformity.

For Saturday evening next the programme offers no originality whatsoever. The orchestra will play Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, Schumann's fourth symphony and Berlioz's "Rakoczy" march, which was long ago relegated to brass bands and popular concerts. Mr. F. Busoni, the pianist, will be the soloist. He, too, promises no addition to the stock of musical knowledge or entertainment, except so far as his mere performance goes, for he has chosen Weber's "Concertstuck" and Liszt's "Spanish" rhapsody.

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, were: Suite in B-minor, for string orchestra and flute, Bach; overture, "Coriolan," Beethoven; Symphony No. 3, (Scotch) Mendelssohn; Overture, "King Lear," Berlioz. The Bach Suite is very interesting but a steady half hour of B-minor makes a severe trial of one's musical orthodoxy, especially in an era when even the merest tyro of an ambitious song writer thinks it crassly conventional to remain in his original key after the second bar of his tune. The suite was beautifully played; in fact, the whole programme was given in a perfect manner. The orchestra was never in a more perfect condition, even under Mr. Gericke. The mischief that Mr. Nikisch worked with it has been wholly remedied, and its playing is always satisfying and delightful. It was a pleasure to hear the Beethoven overture again, freed from the sickly sentimental affectations that the late conductor foisted on it. The reading was dramatic, without exaggeration, and was brilliant, dignified and finely colored. There was no attempt to make the music say more than it said plainly and clearly. The symphony received a clean cut, sympathetic and honest reading, the second movement in particular being given with fascinating grace and piquancy. The "Lear" overture was broadly and effectively interpreted. The work, however, seems to have aged since we last heard it. At the next concert will be given: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concertstuck, Weber; Symphony, D-minor, Schumann; Spanish Rhapsody, Liszt; "Rakoczy" March, Berlioz. Mr. F. Busoni is the soloist.

HERR PAUR HAPPY IN HIS NEW JAMAICA PLAIN HOME.

The Symphony Orchestra's Leader a Most Courteous and Agreeable Man to Meet—
How His English Grows—He Has Two Boys in the Roxbury Latin School.

I spent a very pleasant half hour with Emil Paur, leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon. Herr Paur lives at 28 Burroughs st., Jamaica Plain, in a comfortable looking, spacious two and a half story frame house, a plain structure without any modern architectural frills, in the centre of a large yard. There is plenty of breathing space here, and it is in one of the prettiest parts of this charming suburban districts, just off Centre st. and not far from the beautiful Jamaica Pond. And Herr Paur likes it.

He has lived in Boston but a few months, but he is delighted with his new home and with America and has no desire to exchange them for Leipzig, where he made the reputation that was the cause of his being sought after as the successor of Arthur Nikisch.

The house is modestly furnished, and when I was ushered into what was constructed as the parlor to the left of the hallway, I found the famous director seated before a grand piano rendering a solo that would have filled Music Hall. The other furniture in the room bespoke the man's profession, for, besides the piano, there was an organ, and a cabinet of books and musical compositions, while a violin case was conspicuous on the floor beneath the piano. Sheets of music were scattered about everywhere. Marble busts of Mozart and Beethoven occupied stands in two of the corners, and from one of them depended a great collection of white satin sashes of honor which have been bestowed on Herr Paur for his achievements on numerous notable occasions abroad. On the walls are two framed souvenirs which their owner justly prizes very highly, bits of autograph compositions by Beethoven and portraits of the great musical masters.

Herr Paur was very cordial as he turned and rose to greet his visitor. He wore a plain gray house jacket closely buttoned up beneath his shaggy, sandy beard and his heavy head of hair tumbled down over his forehead in a truly artistic fashion. Altogether the director of the first orchestra in the country has a very agreeably Bohemian, distinguished appearance. He is very interesting to talk with, perhaps not less so because his mastery of English is not quite complete yet, so that the interviewer has to help him out occasionally by suggesting the word he wishes to use.

His inability to speak English fluently, in fact, he used at first as an apology for not expressing himself more freely, but he has made great progress since coming to Boston, when he could not speak a word of our language. He has a teacher, he says, who comes once or twice a week, and the pupil seems to think it a great joke that a man grown should be obliged to learn the rudiments of the language just as a child would do.

Herr Paur has two boys, Hans, aged 11, and Kurt, aged 9. "One of them," said the father, "is in the Roxbury Latin School and the other goes to the grammar school. Oh, they can talk English very well! Sometimes they correct me," and the speaker smiled mischievously.

"Are you going to make musicians of them?"

"Oh, no! They do not like it. They are—what you call it?—so impudent!" This was not just the word Herr Paur wanted, but his eyes twinkled and he laughed as if he had got somewhere near the idea he wished to express, at any rate.

"Well, how do you like Boston, now that you have got acquainted with it?" I asked.

"I am delighted with it, and I like Jamaica Plain so much. But I have not gone about much, nor got acquainted with many people. I have not gone into what you call society. I have no time. I spend all my time at home in study. But the Art Club, that is very nice, isn't it?"

"Do you not take any exercise at all?"

"No, I am not so fond of sports, though I like to walk in the garden in the summer time and play billiards," with the accent strong on the last syllable.

Herr Paur is enjoying in anticipation the new music hall, the plans of which he heartily approves, and rejoices in the prospect of getting into the splendid structure which he hopes will be ready next Nov. It is to be a vast improvement over the old music hall, though he grows enthusiastic over the acoustic properties of the latter.

"It is the best in this country that I have seen," he says, "though the hall in Philadelphia is very good. That in New York is bad. I did not like it at all."

He has not heard the New York Symphony and naively inquired if that were a good orchestra. Then he was asked how the Boston Symphony compared with the orchestras of Europe. He became interested at once and replied frankly, with a sort of unconscious mingling of enthusiasm and modesty:—

"Oh, there is nothing like our orchestra, nothing in the world, not in Berlin or Vienna or anywhere!" and he laughed as much as to imply "What else could you expect me to say?"

"How about Strauss?" I suggested.

"Ugh! Strauss!" and Herr Paur held up one hand deprecatingly, as if Strauss were not to be considered in the category of musicians for a moment, much less be mentioned in the same breath with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. "Strauss! Strauss!" he exclaimed. "That is worse yet. He cannot play the classical music at all!"

Herr Paur has not been West yet. He expects to take the symphony orchestra to Chicago, however, in May for a three weeks' sojourn, where they will play nightly.

He has found Boston a different place from Leipzig, though the fact that he followed Nikisch here took the edge off the strangeness for he was with the latter in Germany four years before coming here. "It was all Nikisch in Leipzig," says he, "and it was the same in Boston."

He has noted a great difference in the temperature here from that to which he has been accustomed, and he has been surprised at the frequent changes in the weather during the winter season, which in Leipzig remains uniformly cold. But he has enjoyed excellent health, he declares, since coming to America, his relations with the orchestra of which he is the director have been harmonious and pleasant, and he is happy. He is certainly a most agreeable man to meet.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

After a dozen concerts presenting music in many different schools, and giving time for the conductor to become well acquainted with his men, one can form a tolerably accurate opinion of Mr. Paur and his merits and limitations, and the concert of Saturday seemed almost an object lesson in these. He is not a man who loses himself in the music, who has perfect abandon or bold caprice, and this may be recorded as one of his merits. He works loyally at the technique of the orchestra and does not despise routine work; the days of personal temperament in reading and ragged ensemble in performance are happily over. He is somewhat of a precisian, but he knows perfectly what he wants and is able to make his orchestra understand it. He is not afraid of a strong crescendo or a fortissimo, but more often attains loudness than breadth in such effects, as witness the blatancy of the noble theme of the coda in the finale of the Scotch symphony. In brief, it is certain that the orchestra is again on the up track, and the new conductor has been a decided gain to the organization.

Bach's suite No. 2, in B minor, for flute and strings, began the programme. It was carefully read and the balance of parts was perfect, but, after all, this vein of performance by a great modern orchestra gives but a slight idea of the quiet intention of the old composer, who would have been well-content to have such a suite given by less than a score of performers. A very small orchestra in Bumstead Hall would come nearer to the composer's original ideal. The succession of movements all in the same key, is not an advantage; it was however a point of tonality on which all the old composers insisted, probably on account of the lute, which was very troublesome to retune, and therefore was given its suite movements in a single key, a custom afterwards extended to the orchestra. The work presented Bach in his most melodic and least intricate side; the stately Sarabande was full of appropriate dignity; Bach seems to have appreciated this old Spanish religious dance (it was formerly danced in the cathedrals in Spain on Holy Thursday) and gives some of his most modern effects in this form. The Polonaise was charmingly played and brought the auditor much nearer to the old processional style of the lofty dance than the fiery effusions of Liszt or Chopin can do. The double, or variation, gave good opportunities for the flute, and Mr. Mole played the elaboration of the theme excellently. Altogether the contrasts of style made amends for the lack of contrasts in key.

The Coriolanus overture was not only one of the best bits of Beethoven reading that has recently been heard in Boston, but the ensemble of the orchestra was something to lavish laudatory adjectives upon. Then came the Scotch symphony, by far the most inspired and the most effective of Mendelssohn's symphonies. There was something of over-boldness in the reading of the chief theme of the first movement, but the performance of the coda with its weird chromatics and great crescendos was most impressive. The spectral touches of clarinette in deepest register (chalmers), were a novelty when Mendelssohn wrote them. Although Mozart had done much for the instrument before this time, it was Mendelssohn and Weber who first discovered the full powers of the noble instrument. In this symphony the clarinette has very much to do (especially in the Scherzo), and its work was excellently done on this occasion.

Mendelssohn caught the spirit of the Scherzo better than any other composer, and this is his best Scherzo. Not only is it symmetrical and melodious, but it is emphatically Scotch without plagiarizing any national tune. In this again Mendelssohn stands paramount; Beethoven, Schumann, Franz, Bruch and a host of other masters have endeavored to represent the Scotch style in some of their music, yet none but Mendelssohn has entirely succeeded. The Scotch flavor is in every movement (least in the third), but it dominates everything in this Scherzo. If Dvorak had succeeded in giving a tenth part as much national flavor to his American symphony it might have been classed as a typically native work. The poetic beauty of the third movement, (not unlike in shape to the slow movement of Beethoven's fifth symphony) was done full justice to by violins and cellos. Then came the Ossianic power of the finale. There was a bold, fierce style in the performance of the chief theme which suited the subject well, and the pensive charm of the counter-theme was well preserved; only in the coda was there more noise than breadth. Such a symphony shows that the ultra-modern reviewers have been celebrating the obliteration of Mendelssohn a few centuries too soon.

Berlioz's "King Lear" overture did not sound well (although splendidly played) after the clearness of the symphony; it seemed spasmodic, forced and artificial. One could imagine almost anything in the alternate wailings and thunderings, in the wild rushes to nowhere in particular, and the sudden pauses and syncopations. Berlioz achieved something really great in his interpretation of the balcony scene from "Romeo and Juliet," but as a general thing Shakespeare strained through a French mind is unsatisfactory, whether the result is given in tones or in Gallic rhymes. It was a great technical triumph for the orchestra to overcome the difficulties which abound in the work, but beyond this it seemed but a severe attack of musical hysteria.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

This was the program of the Symphony Concert given last evening in Music Hall:

Suite No. 2, B minor, for string orchestra and flutes, Bach
Overture, "Coriolan".....Beethoven
Symphony No. 3, A minor.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "King Lear".....Berlioz

It is a doubtful experiment to bring out in modern concert halls the orchestral music of Sebastian Bach. This just man passed his life in writing counterpoint, and his works are many. In his compositions for the organ, in his well-tempered clavier and in some of his choral music he reached sublime heights; but, incredibly industrious, he wrote much that served the passing occasion and now is only of interest to the student. To fall down and worship any page that bears his name is rank fetishism; and yet much that is absolutely stupor from the purely musical standpoint is accepted by blind devotees as the work of inspiration. Now in the Suite played last evening how much was there that was honestly enjoyed by the hearers? I am not denying the supreme excellence of the workmanship, but is there not an absence of genuine musical beauty in some of the numbers of this suite? There are fugues in the "Well-Tempered Clavier," short as they are, that are worth the whole of such bewigged compositions for strings and flutes. There are charming passages in this very suite, but as a whole the work seemed monotonous.

The program book contained a learned note on the Sarabande, and the conclusion drawn from the note is that the characteristic of the dance was a certain stateliness. Now originally the Sarabande, as known in Spain, was a voluptuous dance, so voluptuous that the priests thundered against it from the pulpit. When it was brought into France the Sarabande became a favorite. Ninon de l'Enclos danced it in the 17th century to the great delight of young men. Cardinal Richelieu did not disdain to beat out the steps and flourish in gestures that he might attract the attention of Anne of Austria. And it was Yvetaux, who, at the age of 80 years, asked for a Sarabande tune that his soul might slip away with greater ease.

After the labor of Bach, the family man, came the "Coriolan" overture, which was read in a frank, manly fashion and finely played. Indeed, the work of the orchestra throughout the evening was of a high order of excellence. The familiar symphony of Mendelssohn gave pleasure and it was read most sympathetically by Mr. Paur.

The overture, "King Lear," has not been played at a Symphony concert since the spring of '87. Certain admirers of Berlioz claim that this overture is the greatest of his purely orchestral compositions. I cannot agree with these admirers.

To me this musical version of "King Lear" is not only inadequate from the purely imaginative standpoint; it is not of marked musical interest either in thematic treatment or in instrumentation. Let it be granted that the "Cordelia theme," so called, has a pathetic tenderness and a modest, shrinking beauty; but in this overture there is not the volcanic passion of the old man Lear. The recitative-like opening phrase seems without real meaning, without genuine power. And there is no overwhelming burst of orchestral fury that paints or even suggests the crazed King defying the elements.

Music has its limitations. It is not interchangeable with passionate poetry or with such sonorous prose as that dreamed by the Opium Eater, or with an immortal painting, or with the view of the awful glacier track. This music of Berlioz, when all has been said in its praise, and you take it at its highest valuation, sinks far below the famous pages written by Victor Hugo in his admiration—say, rather, in his worship—of "King Lear."

And yet many have written music suggested by this tragedy. There are operas by Gobati (1881), Reynaud (1888), Sémcladis (1854) and Solowiew (1885). There is incidental music to the tragedy by André (1778), von Blumenthal (1828) and J. L. Hatton (1858). There are the overtures by Berlioz (1831), Leidegabel (1851) and Balakireff (about 1865).

This overture by Balakireff, the Russian, is said to be a remarkable work. Its "Cordelia theme" is said to be of exquisite beauty; the "Lear theme" is "grand and simple," and the instrumentation is of "great discretion and classic accuracy." Shall we ever hear this overture in a Symphony concert?

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 27, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Euryanthe."
WEBER.	CONCERT-STÜCK for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA in F minor, op. 79. I. Larghetto affettuoso.—Allegro passionato. II. Tempo di Marcia. III. Presto gioioso.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 120. I. Ziemlich langsam.—Lebhaft. II. Romanze: Ziemlich langsam. III. Scherzo: Lebhaft.—Trio. IV. Langsam.—Lebhaft.
LISZT.	RHAPSODIE ESPAGNOLE, rearranged as a CONCERT-STÜCK for PIANOFORTE and ORCHESTRA by F. BUSONI. (MS.) (First time.)
BERLIOZ.	RÁKÓCZY MARCH, from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24.

Soloist:

MR. F. BUSONI.

THE THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY

A Brilliant Programme Given With Great Technical Excellence.

The programme of the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Musical Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concert-stück, for piano and orchestra. Weber
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.....Schumann
Spanish Rhapsody.....Liszt
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz
Mr. F. Busoni was soloist.

The Spanish Rhapsody is a re-arrangement of Liszt's piece by F. Busoni, its new form being that of a concert piece for piano and orchestra; it was played from manuscript, and for the first time on this occasion.

This programme taken altogether was a brilliant one and of reasonable length. The orchestra played magnificently as regards volume of tone, precision and general technical excellence. Mr. Paur had it well in hand, and was eminently successful in making it obey the dictation of his intention. He however gave too robust a touch to about everything performed, thereby failing to gain repose and to obtain sufficient contrast in strictly orchestral numbers always.

The playing of the Schumann Symphony was consequently a disappointment, for it was too noisy, generally speaking. One might object to the slow tempo in the melodic episodes that occurred, and reasonably so, also, especially in the "Euryanthe" Overture, but, if this modern failing or fad be excepted, and the robustness of the renderings be overlooked, then it must be said that the playing throughout the evening showed many excellent qualities. The drummer, however, made it dismal for the acute ear with the false intonation of his instruments, but he did not pound so terribly as at the previous concert. His fury can still be modified with beneficial results.

What a noble work is Schumann's Symphony No. 4. It stands upon the highest plane of symphonic writing. As broad and massive as it is, it demands, however, a more gentle touch than Mr. Paur gave it, at times, to do justice to the depths of its composer's emotion. The accompaniment to the Concert-stück of Weber, was played with fine effect.

The orchestral part of the Spanish Rhapsody, however, was a matter of considerable anxiety to both the conductor and the players, but they got through without accident.

As excellent as was the playing of the "Euryanthe" Overture, it did not cause the listener to forget the more refined, highly artistic and superbly effective renderings that this and the other Weber overtures have received in these concerts under the baton of Mr. Gericke. The Rakoczy March was played in a loud and brilliant manner. All of the orchestral numbers called forth the most enthusiastic applause.

When Mr. Busoni came forth to play his first number he was warmly welcomed. What amazing technical resources this player possesses. There seems to be no limit to his faculty in the matter of execution. There is a lack of warmth in his temperament, however, that often is felt in places requiring sensitive expression, as in the larghetto affettuoso of Weber's Concert-stück. This was the case Saturday evening in his rendering of that movement. He also took the last movement at a tremendous pace that caused it to suffer somewhat in clearness. In the Liszt number Mr. Busoni shone in his most brilliant light. The greatest technical difficulties were accomplished with the utmost facility; in brilliancy and power the rendering was simply marvellous. The audience was wildly enthusiastic over the display, and recalled the player many times.

There is a constant improvement in the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Paur's conducting. It is to be hoped that with his many excellences Mr. Paur will yet show a finer sense of the gradation of tone, and impart more repose to his renderings. A higher form of expression will thus be secured and more effective contrasts gained. The effect will be heightened, the climaxes made more powerful, and the monotony of constant over-loudness will be remedied. If, however, Mr. Paur's musical nature is too robust, then probably we shall not experience this refinement in orchestral renderings, and he will never gain that high standard that Mr. Gericke established.

The programme next Saturday evening will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; Morceau Fantastique for cello and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler; ballet music, "Feramors," Rubinstein; and overture to "Esther," D'Albert.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC.

Snitte

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, were: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concert-Stück for piano and orchestra, Weber; Symphony in D-minor, op. 120, Schumann; Rhapsodie Espagnole, Liszt-Busoni; Rakoczy March, Berlioz. The soloist was Mr. F. Busoni. The Weber overture was given a masterly reading. The climax was worked up with immense effect, and the brilliancy of the performance as a whole was remarkable. The symphony was vigorously interpreted, but the rendering, as a whole, was too persistently noisy, and as a consequence there was a lack of necessary contrast in tone color. It was immensely effective, and the orchestra never surpassed the precision, the fire and the beauty of technique it displayed in this work. Had there been something more of temperance in the reading the presentation of this music would have been surprisingly fine. As it was, it was stirring and impressive enough, but the coloring was too monotonously heavy. The Berlioz March was given with immense spirit; but here, too, something was left to be wished for on the score of delicacy and piquancy in the less stormy phases of the score. Mr. Busoni, who was received very cordially, played the Weber concert-piece with almost surprising deftness of technique. The effect of the opening larghetto might have been heightened if its tenderness had been better emphasized. The following allegro was taken at a fearful pace, so fast, indeed, that its proper character was lost and it became a mere means for a display of rapid fingering. This was indeed astonishing enough in the distinct utterances that attended the furious rush with which the movement was given, but the meaning of the music was lost in colorless virtuosity, and its rhythm was not always distinct. The finale was also reduced to an exhibition of finger work. As a triumph of technique it was fairly wonderful, but as an interpretation it was of little value. Mr. Busoni's performance, however, stirred his audience to a frenzy of applause, and he was recalled three times with a fervor that was almost wild in its exuberance. The Liszt piece, which was rearranged for piano and orchestra, and with great skill and effect, is a trashy and, musically speaking, an uninteresting bit of charlatanism. Its difficulties are immense. Mr. Busoni's performance of the work was extraordinary in the amazing skill in finger flexibility that it showed. His fingers are as rapid as the wind, and as firm as steel. It would be impossible to play a show piece in a more perfectly showy style than this one was played by the artist, who was again stormily applauded, and recalled four times. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; Morceaux Fantastiques, for cello and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler (first time); Ballet Music, "Feramors," Rubinstein; Overture, "Esther," E. D'Albert (first time). The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

It would not have been easy, even for the being most oppressed by the standard Music Hall atmosphere, to get in much of a nap during the thirteenth symphony concert. In the first place the programme was comfortably short, although it had five numbers; and in the second place, those numbers were all good lively, demonstrative, insistent pieces, in which the band grew bigger and noisier as at each remove the lengthening chain of harmony was dragged.

For a beginning there was Weber's familiar overture to "Euryanthe," in which there is no weak spot, although there are a few soft ones. It begins with a dash and a decision which make one sit up in his seat at once with expectancy, if he knows the work, and with a lively curiosity if he does not. The latter will be interested to find out if Weber "can hold out as he has begun," to use the homely New England phrase. But he can; and although he has to toy a little with those gloomy tone-combinations of which he seemed to have the patent—a patent upon which nobody has successfully infringed—and to indulge in a brief, poetic reverie, he soon comes back to his splendor and vitality for his finale. The overture had a well considered and very effective rendering.

The second number was also from Weber, being his favorite "Concert-Stück," in which the solo part was taken by Mr. Busoni, who was warmly welcomed as he came to the piano. This composition is unquestionably original and able; it is put together with admirable knowledge of all the instruments and respect for them; it has brilliant, fanciful or romantic passages which are well worthy of its author, and it is both a test of a pianist's ability and a gratification to him as a study. Yet it does not make quite the effect which one would expect from its reputation, the favor which it has enjoyed and the mastership of composition which it demonstrates. But Mr. Busoni, who adds to honest, broad phrasing, a flashing style of ornamentation and a sure, bold execution, a genuine enthusiasm, made it unusually telling, both in mere technical delivery and in animation of spirit, contrasting well the pretty, glistening march with the more usual types of the vigorous beginning and end.

Schumann's noble fourth symphony followed, his injunction that the several movements should proceed without interruption being obeyed by Mr. Paur, who also attended carefully and agreeably to the proper presentment of each according to its mood and form. The opposition between the soft pensiveness of the romance and the burly, heavy-footed gaiety of the scherzo was well discriminated, and the climax of the final allegro brought up ably to the vehement presto of the finale.

Mr. Busoni now reappeared to take the lead in Liszt's "Spanish" rhapsody, which he had arranged for piano and orchestra. There is no end

THE THIRTEENTH SYMPHONY

A Brilliant Programme Given With Great Technical Excellence.

The programme of the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Musical Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Concert-stück, for piano and orchestra. Weber
Symphony No. 4, in D minor.....Schumann
Spanish Rhapsody.....Liszt
Rakoczy March.....Berlioz
Mr. F. Busoni was soloist.

The Spanish Rhapsody is a re-arrangement of Liszt's piece by F. Busoni, its new form being that of a concert piece for piano and orchestra; it was played from manuscript, and for the first time on this occasion.

This programme taken altogether was a brilliant one and of reasonable length. The orchestra played magnificently as regards volume of tone, precision and general technical excellence. Mr. Paur had it well in hand, and was eminently successful in making it obey the dictation of his intention. He however gave too robust a touch to about everything performed, thereby failing to gain repose and to obtain sufficient contrast in strictly orchestral numbers always.

The playing of the Schumann Symphony was consequently a disappointment, for it was too noisy, generally speaking. One might object to the slow tempo in the melodic episodes that occurred, and reasonably so, also, especially in the "Euryanthe" Overture, but, if this modern failing or fad be excepted, and the robustness of the renderings be overlooked, then it must be said that the playing throughout the evening showed many excellent qualities. The drummer, however, made it dismal for the acute ear with the false intonation of his instruments, but he did not pound so terribly as at the previous concert. His fury can still be modified with beneficial results.

What a noble work is Schumann's Symphony No. 4. It stands upon the highest plane of symphonic writing. As broad and massive as it is, it demands, however, a more gentle touch than Mr. Paur gave it, at times, to do justice to the depths of its composer's emotion. The accompaniment to the Concert-stück of Weber, was played with fine effect.

The orchestral part of the Spanish Rhapsody, however, was a matter of considerable anxiety to both the conductor and the players, but they got through without accident.

As excellent as was the playing of the "Euryanthe" Overture, it did not cause the listener to forget the more refined, highly artistic and superbly effective renderings that this and the other Weber overtures have received in these concerts under the baton of Mr. Gericke. The Rakoczy March was played in a loud and brilliant manner. All of the orchestral numbers called forth the most enthusiastic applause.

When Mr. Busoni came forth to play his first number he was warmly welcomed. What amazing technical resources this player possesses. There seems to be no limit to his faculty in the matter of execution. There is a lack of warmth in his temperament, however, that often is felt in places requiring sensitive expression, as in the larghetto affettuoso of Weber's Concert-stück. This was the case Saturday evening in his rendering of that movement. He also took the last movement at a tremendous pace that caused it to suffer somewhat in clearness. In the Liszt number Mr. Busoni shone in his most brilliant light. The greatest technical difficulties were accomplished with the utmost facility; in brilliancy and power the rendering was simply marvellous. The audience was wildly enthusiastic over the display, and recalled the player many times.

There is a constant improvement in the playing of the orchestra under Mr. Paur's conducting. It is to be hoped that with his many excellences Mr. Paur will yet show a finer sense of the gradation of tone, and impart more repose to his renderings. A higher form of expression will thus be secured and more effective contrasts gained. The effect will be heightened, the climaxes made more powerful, and the monotony of constant over-loudness will be remedied. If, however, Mr. Paur's musical nature is too robust, then probably we shall not experience this refinement in orchestral renderings, and he will never gain that high standard that Mr. Gericke established.

The programme next Saturday evening will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; Morceau Fantastique for cello and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler; ballet music, "Feramors," Rubinstein; and overture to "Esther," D'Albert.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC.

Seattle

The Symphony Concert.

The selections for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, were: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; Concert-Stück for piano and orchestra, Weber; Symphony in D-minor, op. 120, Schumann; Rhapsodie Espagnole, Liszt-Busoni; Rakoczy March, Berlioz. The soloist was Mr. F. Busoni. The Weber overture was given a masterly reading. The climax was worked up with immense effect, and the brilliancy of the performance as a whole was remarkable. The symphony was vigorously interpreted, but the rendering, as a whole, was too persistently noisy, and as a consequence there was a lack of necessary contrast in tone color. It was immensely effective, and the orchestra never surpassed the precision, the fire and the beauty of technique it displayed in this work. Had there been something more of temperance in the reading the presentation of this music would have been surprisingly fine. As it was, it was stirring and impressive enough, but the coloring was too monotonously heavy. The Berlioz March was given with immense spirit; but here, too, something was left to be wished for on the score of delicacy and piquancy in the less stormy phases of the score. Mr. Busoni, who was received very cordially, played the Weber concert-piece with almost surprising deftness of technique. The effect of the opening larghetto might have been heightened if its tenderness had been better emphasized. The following allegro was taken at a fearful pace, so fast, indeed, that its proper character was lost and it became a mere means for a display of rapid fingering. This was indeed astonishing enough in the distinct utterances that attended the furious rush with which the movement was given, but the meaning of the music was lost in colorless virtuosity, and its rhythm was not always distinct. The finale was also reduced to an exhibition of finger work. As a triumph of technique it was fairly wonderful, but as an interpretation it was of little value. Mr. Busoni's performance, however, stirred his audience to a frenzy of applause, and he was recalled three times with a fervor that was almost wild in its exuberance. The Liszt piece, which was rearranged for piano and orchestra, and with great skill and effect, is a trashy and, musically speaking, an uninteresting bit of charlatanism. Its difficulties are immense. Mr. Busoni's performance of the work was extraordinary in the amazing skill in finger flexibility that it showed. His fingers are as rapid as the wind, and as firm as steel. It would be impossible to play a show piece in a more perfectly showy style than this one was played by the artist, who was again stormily applauded, and recalled four times. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 8, Beethoven; Morceaux Fantastiques, for cello and orchestra, C. M. Loeffler (first time); Ballet Music, "Feramors," Rubinstein; Overture, "Esther," E. D'Albert (first time). The soloist is Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

It would not have been easy, even for the being most oppressed by the standard Music Hall atmosphere, to get in much of a nap during the thirteenth symphony concert. In the first place the programme was comfortably short, although it had five numbers; and in the second place, those numbers were all good lively, demonstrative, insistent pieces, in which the band grew bigger and noisier as at each remove the lengthening chain of harmony was dragged.

For a beginning there was Weber's familiar overture to "Euryanthe," in which there is no weak spot, although there are a few soft ones. It begins with a dash and a decision which make one sit up in his seat at once with expectancy, if he knows the work, and with a lively curiosity if he does not. The latter will be interested to find out if Weber "can hold out as he has begun," to use the homely New England phrase. But he can; and although he has to toy a little with those gloomy tone-combinations of which he seemed to have the patent—a patent upon which nobody has successfully infringed—and to indulge in a brief, poetic reverie, he soon comes back to his splendor and vitality for his finale. The overture had a well considered and very effective rendering.

The second number was also from Weber, being his favorite "Concert-Stück," in which the solo part was taken by Mr. Busoni, who was warmly welcomed as he came to the piano. This composition is unquestionably original and able; it is put together with admirable knowledge of all the instruments and respect for them; it has brilliant, fanciful or romantic passages which are well worthy of its author, and it is both a test of a pianist's ability and a gratification to him as a study. Yet it does not make quite the effect which one would expect from its reputation, the favor which it has enjoyed and the mastership of composition which it demonstrates. But Mr. Busoni, who adds to honest, broad phrasing, a flashing style of ornamentation and a sure, bold execution, a genuine enthusiasm, made it unusually telling, both in mere technical delivery and in animation of spirit, contrasting well the pretty, glistening march with the more usual types of the vigorous beginning and end.

Schumann's noble fourth symphony followed, his injunction that the several movements should proceed without interruption being obeyed by Mr. Paur, who also attended carefully and agreeably to the proper presentment of each according to its mood and form. The opposition between the soft pensiveness of the romance and the burly, heavy-footed gaiety of the scherzo was well discriminated, and the climax of the final allegro brought up ably to the vehement presto of the finale.

Mr. Busoni now reappeared to take the lead in Liszt's "Spanish" rhapsody, which he had arranged for piano and orchestra. There is no end of ingenuity and ability in this arrangement, and the performance elicited a great deal of applause. But we may reasonably doubt if the result were worth the trouble of composition and rehearsal. The rhapsody is augmented in size; but is it enhanced in value? There are a host of sudden little fits and starts of phrasing,—isolated spurts of piccolo, short rattle of castanets, tap of drum or collision of cymbals, which may be supposed to imply a fitful, feverish, irregular and emphatic excitement, and therefore to suit with the kind of terpsichorean exercise which the lumbering Carmencita has so often illustrated to the ecstasy of the Four Hundred in its boudoirs and studios and to the admiration of the average citizen in theatres and music halls. But is the adaptation expressive and just? This queer, erratic—and often uncanny and gruesome—orchestration suggests to us a revel of gnomes or a spree of ghosts far more than an ardent, sensuous, expansive and amatory ebullition of sunlit, fervid Spain. We do not deny the cleverness and a certain kind of effectiveness, deriving chiefly from the oddities and the difficulties of the score; but we are not prepared to praise the labor as well devoted or to think that the time of the orchestra and the audience was at all well bestowed upon an experiment of this kind, when so much music of approved worth, dignity and beauty lies unnoticed and unknown. Nor was the performance very commendable. Mr. Busoni was too anxious about the outcome to give himself freely to his share, and the fragmentary nature of much of the score kept the orchestra on the tenterhooks all the time and made their attacks uncertain and their reading ragged.

Mr. Busoni wanted the extra percussion instruments to fill up his quota of noise; and so, as they were on hand, it seemed economical to utilize them further. Therefore the concert ended with a pretty loud and showy performance of the Rákóczy march, which has now about as much right to appear on a Symphony programme as the Anvil Chorus, or the Kermesse from Faust.

Next Saturday night will be played Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; the ballet music in Rubinstein's "Feramors," and Eugene d'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's drama, "Esther," together with a manuscript work which is sure to be worth the hearing—a "morceau fantastique" for violoncello and orchestra, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

Why would it not be a wholesome thing for the Symphony management just to print a neat little edition of Berlioz's effusive prose writings—or at any rate of the "A Travers Champs"—and present copies outright to its patrons, instead of doling them out, a half a dozen pages at a time through three or four years of programme books? There might then be a chance for some other essayist on music to be heard from.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the thirteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Weber: Overture to "Euryanthe."

Weber: Concert-Stück for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, Opus 79.

Schumann: Symphony No. 4, in D minor, Opus 120.

Liszt: Rhapsodie Espagnole, rearranged as a Concert-Stück for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni.

Berlioz: Rákóczy March from "La Damnation de Faust," Opus 24.

Mr. F. Busoni was the pianist.

The "Euryanthe" overture was given with great spirit and effect. The performance of the Schumann symphony was, in many respects, one of the finest we have heard; it was marked by noteworthy painstaking in the matter of following the composer's expression marks, the tempi were in general admirable, and the whole thing was played with great fire, force and effectiveness. Now and then, to be sure, one regretted to note the cropping-up again of an old tendency, and one that has been complained of more than once before, in past years; a disposition on the part of the strings, and at times of the wood-wind also, to play expressive cantilena, marked "piano, dolce" in the score, too passionately and with too much tone. The temptation to imitate the old 'cellist, in the amateur orchestra, who replied to the conductor's reiterated cries of "piano!" with "Oh! don't bother me; if you only knew what a delight it is to bring out that big full tone!" is doubtless great in such cases; but giving in to it does not bring about the best artistic results. Another defect of the same sort was a tendency to begin too loud on cantabile phrases, marked "crescendo." Bülow's paradoxical-sounding rule has, after all, much truth at the bottom of it: "Crescendo means piano; diminuendo means forte!" We have said that Mr. Paur's tempi were generally excellent; we might say more than this, that his slight modifications of the tempo in the first movement were as finely artistic as possible. Only in the last movement did we find one exceptionable point: the sudden, and to us wholly unaccountable, slackening of the tempo on the third theme,—the one that first enters in A major in the first violins, flute, and oboe, and is worked up with characteristically Schumannesque persistency. The point of view from which this theme can be regarded as a sentimental phrase is to us inconceivable; with all its "piano, dolce" marking, it is to our mind a phrase that pushes irresistibly forward and onward, not one that tends to hold back. The little sforzando accent on the second beat, the omitting the first beat in the violins, the dotted-eighths and sixteenths on the third and fourth beats, all point to lightness, buoyant grace, perhaps even to something of coquettishness, but in no wise to sentimentalism; had the phrase been one of sentimental purport, the third beat of the measure would have had two eighths, not a dotted eighth and a sixteenth—and it was noticeable on Saturday evening that some of the orchestra instinctively felt this; some of the wind players, evidently entering into the spirit of Mr. Paur's slow tempo, could not help now and then giving the sixteenth-note of the third beat almost the full value of an eighth. If the modern musical mind could only grasp the fact that every bit of lyric cantilena is not of necessity slow! But for the few exceptions mentioned, the performance was exceedingly fine, and was heartily recognized as such by the audience.

Berlioz's Rákóczy March was given with all due fire and vim, and with a certain appreciation for telling details that would have been immensely effective, had the ensemble-playing been more exact; as it was, the performance was rather ragged. For one point, what could have been the idea of omitting the cymbals throughout the first half of the march? The bass-drum strokes "simulating far-off cannon shots," were all too feeble; we doubt if anyone heard them who did not know beforehand that they were there.

It is a long time since Weber's Concert-Stück has been heard in Boston; Mr. Busoni is much to be thanked for reviving it once more, for it is a composition quite unique in its way, and has in it the stuff of which immortality is made. Mr. Busoni played it superbly, with true sentiment in the first part, and with infinite dash and verve in the final rondo. It was great playing! We can not but think, however—Liszt and almost all modern pianists to the contrary notwithstanding—that it is a mistake to add a pianoforte part to the orchestral march intermezzo; Weber's orchestration is here so absolutely delicious that the superadded strumming of the pianoforte does more harm than good. It is also noticeable how none of the more or less ingeniously devised substitutes for Weber's glissando octaves produce any really satisfying effect; to be sure, no pianist need be asked to tear his fingers to pieces by sliding octaves on a modern concert-grand; but we have heard these scales played glissando in single notes with more telling effect than comes from any of the Liszt or Bülow devices.

Mr. Busoni's arrangement of Liszt's Rhapsodie espagnole for pianoforte and orchestra is about as brilliantly done as could be imagined; indeed, it is so enormously effective as to be really worth while. His playing was one of the most stupendous exhibitions of pianoforte virtuosity we have ever witnessed, and was, moreover, admirably artistic at every point. Anyone anxious to learn how the pianoforte can be made to scintillate and corruscate against a background of the most gorgeous orchestral coloring, should hear Mr. Busoni play this piece. The audience went fairly wild with enthusiasm over it, as indeed it did over his playing of the Weber Concert-Stück; he was repeatedly called out after both pieces.

The next programme is: Beethoven, No. 8, in F major, opus 93; C. M. Loeffler, morceau fantastique pour violoncelle et orchestre (MS.); Rubinstein, ballet-music from "Feramors;" d'Albert, overture to Grillparzer's "Esther." Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the 'cellist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. F. Busoni.

Beauties of "Tobacco"—Mr. George
Grossmith to Talk About America—
The West Point Band's Visit—Plans for Opera—Slivinski's Recitals—News
Notes and Gossip.

Conductor Emil Paur needs a word of caution.

Another concert like that of last evening will go far to make the symphony synonym for a popular event rather than an educational one.

The programme was modelled after those with which Mr. Heus bel est blished these concerts, and it is a model that can hardly be improved upon.

Such, at least, was evidently the opinion of the audience last evening, and as it was one of the largest of the season its preferences have some right to be respected.

The soloist was Ferruccio B. Busoni, a pianist who has already established himself in the favor of Boston auditors, but has never received such a recognition of his abilities as that given him last evening.
His great achievement was the performance of the "Spanish Rhapsody" by Liszt, which he had rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra. The work done by Mr. Busoni in the arrangement of this concert piece commands the sincerest commendation, for in the use of the orchestra he has equalled the master Liszt in his arrangements of his own and other composers' works for the orchestra. Mr. Busoni's work at the piano was nothing more or less than stupendous.
Such an exhibition of a complete mastery of this instrument has seldom been heard in this city within the present generation.
He rose to the demands of his own great score in a way that aroused the enthusiasm of his hearers, on both sides the stage line the musicians of the orchestra vied with the patrons of the concert in expressing their admiration for the work done by the pianist. Such a scene of enthusiasm has seldom attended the appearance of the pianists of the day, and it can be honestly said that Mr. Busoni deserved the great compliment paid him.

Mr. Busoni's earlier appearance was made in the familiar concertstucke by Weber in F minor, op. 79. In his playing of the first movement of this piece Mr. Busoni appeared at some disadvantage, his interpretation having certain mechanical characteristics which are at times noticeable in his playing. In the march movement, however, this characteristic entirely disappeared, and throughout the second and third movements he played in a fashion to satisfy the most critical. Altogether,
Mr. Busoni is to be congratulated upon having reached the climax of his career in this city on this occasion.

Mr. Paur introduced the programme with a delightful performance of the "Euryanthe" overture, and in the middle of the programme came the Schumann symphony

No. 4, which has seldom had a more thoroughly gratifying performance than that given it on this occasion. The four movements were played without pause, and the entire work was given with the brilliancy and fire that realized all its beauties in the most complete manner.

When the great "Rakoczy" march was reached at the end of the programme the audience had well nigh exhausted itself in the way of enthusiasm, but such a performance of this composition would quicken the pulses and stir the blood of the most blase concertgoer. This is what it did on this occasion, at least, and the magnificent fashion in which this stupendous composition was read and played sent the audience out of the hall full of a mira-tion for the new conductor and the men over whom he has gained such a mastery control. The concert will not soon be forgotten by those who heard it.

Next Saturday evening's programme includes the eighth Beethoven symphony, the ballet music from Feramors, Eugene D'Albert overture to Esther, and a morceau fantastique for the 'cello and orchestra by C. M. Loeffler.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The feature at the symphony rehearsal and concert was the superb piano playing of Mr. Ferruccio Busoni, his numbers being a Weber concert piece and Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody" arranged by the pianist for orchestra and piano. The other numbers on the program were Weber's overture to "Euryanthe," Schumann's symphony No. 4 and Berlioz' Rakoczy march from "The Damnation of Faust."

Mr. Busoni's performance was refined, scholarly and without a trace of sensationalism or display to catch the eyes of the auditor. In the Weber number, the preliminary theme and development were broadly treated, the fragmentary parts being clear and effective. The arpeggios and the coda ending the first movement were brilliant, the march in the second part was finely and firmly marked, and the difficult glissandos in octaves, played as written, were very smooth and regular.

In arranging the Liszt rhapsody Mr.
Busoni has given the orchestra some difficult work to do, the transitions and breaks being ingenious and very frequent. The characteristics of the two dances forming the composition have been well preserved, and save a slight deviation in tempo between the pianist and orchestra in some of the more rapid passages, the work was finely performed. The applause at the close of Mr. Busoni's numbers was hearty, and he was recalled several times to the platform.

The orchestral numbers were most satisfactorily interpreted. The second version of the Schumann symphony was used. The "spiral figures" were clearly given out by the different contingents, and the Schu-mannesque tone of the work was thoroughly preserved by Mr. Paur and his men.
The Rakoczy march was given in a spirited and properly tumultuous manner.

This is the program for the concert by the orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday night: Beethoven, eighth symphony; Loeffler, fantastic piece, violoncello and orchestra, first time; Rubinstein, ballet music from "Feramors;" D'Albert, overture to Grillparzer's "Esther."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The orchestral part of the concert of Saturday was a disappointment. Everything was done with a heavy hand and almost every trace of delicacy vanished from the performance. Yet evidence that the orchestra plays together with more unani-mity than heretofore was not lacking, and there was clearness even amidst a far too constant power. The general public will always prefer force to careful shading, and it was not surprising to find the applause greater than that which would have greeted a more subtle reading.

In the Weber numbers a degree of spicy sensation may be permitted; one does not render Weber as if he were Beethoven, and the strongly marked contrasts of the "Euryanthe" overture were merits rather than defects, for Weber was theatrical in his style and an accentuation of his effects is to be desired. In the performance there was great virility and the composer's thoughts stood forth as clear cut as if they were a silhouette. But when this process was applied to the more dreamy Schumann the result was most unsatisfactory. The D minor symphony has been given in these concerts by all of the conductors, and never so roughly as on this occasion.
Even the beautiful Romanza (so song-like that Schumann originally wrote a guitar accompaniment for the cello theme) was given with sturdiness, and the reading proved that Mr. Paur, while advancing the orchestra in the direction of unity, cares less for details of shading.
Naturally the forcible touches made the Rakoczy March very exciting, but the auditor unfamiliar with the work would scarcely have suspected the thrilling effect made by Thomas or Gericke in the soft passage of the beginning. Nevertheless the steadiness and perfect ensemble of the orchestra was something to praise, and the applause here was to a great extent deserved, which it was not in the case of the Schumann symphony, the least creditable part of the evening's performance.

The fortissimo character of the concert did not limit itself to the orchestra. Mr.
Busoni has wrists of steel, and much prefers the fortiter in re to the suaviter in modo.
As both of his numbers were of the brilliant type, his energy was well placed. He began with the Weber "Concert-stueck," which is largely given over to heroic and to joyful emotions. It is one of the best examples of programme music in the piano repertoire, and possesses the true Weberian contrasts. There was an inclination to force the pace in the delineation of parting and of the subsequent sorrow in absence, but the march theme (which is twin brother to the effect which Raff used later, in his "Lenore" symphony) and the jubilant and triumphant reunion, were performed with a verve that compelled admiration, and won many recalls. In Liszt's "Spanish Rhapsody" Mr. Busoni appeared in a dual role, for the orchestration of the work was his own. This scoring shows the pianist to be capable of excellent work in the modern style of orchestration;
it has more definite purpose than the scoring of the Busoni Symphonic Poem, which out-Berliozed Berlioz in these concerts two seasons ago. Triangle, tambourine, castag-nettes, cymbals and all possible touches of percussion were present in the Rhapsody, the tropical flavor was well-preserved, and even pierrari seemed to pipe in portions of the work.

Whether taken as a Liszt composition or a Busoni arrangement, however, the work is little else than virtuosity; taken on this level it won a very great success, and four recalls testified the delight of the audience.
Although the pianist's work at this concert did not represent the classical school, he has so thoroughly won his spurs in the deeper vein that it is only owing his versatility to praise him from the purely technical side; his brilliancy is simply phenomenal. Had he not made his first appearances here under the shadow of the Paderewski craze he would have caused a furor. If he yet lacks the perfect balance and self-poise of a Paderewski, if he leans a little more towards the brilliantly technical or the calmly intellectual than towards the poetic and emotional, these are things which experience, rather than criticism, will correct.
Meanwhile, Mr. Busoni is a great pianist with possibilities of becoming world-famous.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC.

The Thirteenth Concert of the Bos- ton Symphony Orchestra.

This was the program of the Symphony Concert last evening in Music Hall:

Overture, "Euryanthe".....	Weber
Concert-stuck for pianoforte and orchestra in F
minor, op. 79.....	Weber
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120.....	Schumann
Rhapsodie Espagnole, rearranged as a concert-stuck for pianoforte and orchestra by F. Busoni (MS.) (first time).....	Liszt
Rakoczy March.....	Berlioz

Mr. Paur was in Ercles vein. The performance of the symphony was characterized chiefly by a virility that at times stepped over the border line and became coarseness. Take the opening measures of the first movement, "Ziemlich langsam." Schumann was most careful in his dynamic indications in these measures, but Mr. Paur saw almost nothing in them but a brave forte; or he read them through a magnifying glass, and romance fled. We have heard the Romanze played more romantically in Music Hall, and the trio of the Scherzo has been given here with more tenderness. In the Finale, the slow introduction was well read and performed with marked effect; but the modern practice of singing every note of three measures with "great expression" and letting the rhythm flag without any really adequate reason was followed by Mr. Paur in the allegro (or lebhaft as Schumann was pleased to call it). It seems now to be an inflexible rule with conductors of the advanced school to make a marked change in tempo with the entrance of the subsidiary theme. There are singers who cannot sing allegro and at the same time piano; and there are conductors who apparently believe that a gentle or a pathetic theme in an allegro must of itself turn the allegro into an andante con moto or an allegretto. As in the symphony last evening, so in the overture, as far as this question of subsidiary themes was concerned.

The performance of the orchestra in the symphony was not always up to the high standard that has characterized the concerts of late. But the music itself is so passionate, melancholy and noble, that hearty applause followed the finale and Mr. Paur was recalled.

Mr. Busoni gave a remarkable exhibition of technique. The most difficult passages were played with apparent ease and with grace. In the piece by Weber, which, I believe, has not been played at a Symphony Concert since '85, when Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist, there was an occasional lack of pronounced rhythm, as in the opening of the finale; but, on the whole, Mr. Busoni's performance was remarkable for its precision, power and brilliancy. The pianist enlivened the second movement with embellishments, joining with the orchestra in the march, and although purists might object to Weber improved, the audience enjoyed the modern version. Mr. Busoni is by no means alone in this treatment of the march.

The Spanish Rhapsody, as arranged by Mr. Busoni and played by him, is great sport. There is no need here of debating the question whether the true characteristics of the Jota are preserved in this Liszt-Busoni machine. It is sufficient to say that Busoni has given the piano piece a gorgeously colored and highly fantastic dress. It was a great evening for the men who deal in percussion, and there was a most diversified exhibition of musical fireworks from cannon crackers to sky-scraping rockets, from pin-wheels to set-pieces of intricate construction. Mr. Busoni did what he pleased with the piano. The harder the task, the more demoniac his agility. All forms of technical exercises known as supreme and transcendental were playthings in his fingers. His reception was hearty, and the applause that followed his feats was long continued and loudly sustained. The evening, when Mr. Busoni was on the stage, was one of bravura rather than of temperament. Mr. Busoni has in times past in this city, which should have kept him as her citizen, risen to a greater musical height; he has afforded an audience greater and purer musical pleasure, but he has never, at least in public, given so remarkable an exhibition of modern technique as he did last evening.

PHILIP HALE.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Passing of the Celebrated Ferruccio Busoni.

Found July 11, 94
A Singular Commentary on
Parochial Taste.

An Olla Podrida of Musical News and Gossip.

Ferruccio Busoni, pianist and composer, proposes to return to Europe. I hear that he will not visit this country again until '96 or '97. During his stay in the United States he has been recognized as a pianist of the first rank, so far as technical proficiency and artistic sincerity are concerned; but his stay here has not brought him substantial or even adequate pecuniary reward.

Now Busoni at the age of 10 years (1870) was loudly praised when he appeared before the Vienna public. Hanslick then spoke of his musical nature and uncommon memory, and encouraged him in the field of composition. In 1881 his native city gave him a gold medal. In 1884 the Philharmonic Academy of Bologna granted him the Master's diploma, "a distinction which had not been won by so young an artist since Mozart." In 1890 he won the composer's prize ($1000) given by Rubinstein to the best pianist-composer, appearing in an international contest before a jury of musicians selected from the different musical countries of the world. He was immediately made a professor in the higher grades of piano instruction at the Imperial Conservatory of Moscow, Russia.

It was in 1891 that Busoni came to the United States and settled in Boston. His first appearance at a concert of note was at a Symphony concert, Nov. 14, 1891. It is not now necessary to review the remarkable characteristics and the limitations of this pianist.

But it may be said, and it should be said, that after he left the New England Conservatory, Mr. Busoni, a European celebrity, with the greatest difficulty made both ends meet. He is a temperate, economical, industrious man, and his failure can in no way be attributed to his personal foible or fault. This pianist, whose technique surpasses that of Paderewski, could not in this town of culture give concerts with marked pecuniary success. This teacher, whose merits were appreciated in European cities, did not find here pupils enough to pay his modest expenses.

He left Boston last fall and lived in New York. How he fared there I do not know, but his intention is to leave the country in a few months or weeks.

Is it not a sad and an ironical commentary on the condition of art in the United States that the explanation of his ill fortune is, according to his friends' and his own belief, this: He was not properly introduced?

In other words, European reputation and a public display of ability, rare even in these days, are as nothing. The question is not, "How does he play?" The question is this: "Did he bring a letter of introduction to Mr. X, the wealthy amateur, or to Mrs. Y, the enthusiastic patter-on-the-back of mediocrity?"

Mr. Busoni is certainly one of the ablest virtuosos that Boston has ever heard, but he is not by any means a sympathetic player. He may equal Paderewski in celerity and precision of execution but he is a long way from him in sentiment and color. And when he does fairly pitch in for vehemence, he can get as violently metallic, harsh and ugly noises out of the strings as anybody on record. One cannot then envy the owners of the piano, whose character for endurance he is establishing at the expense of its credit for beauty. But he is quite a "wizard of the key-board" all the same, and there are few really great players who duplicate Mr. Baermann's avoidance of all banging.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.

- I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
- II. Allegretto scherzando
- III. Tempo di menuetto.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

C. M. LOEFFLER.

CONCERTO FANTASTIQUE, for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA. (MS.)
Allegro.
Adagio.
Allegro.—Theme russe: Poco Allegretto.—Presto.
(First time.)

RUBINSTEIN.

BALLET-MUSIC from "Feramors."
I. Dance of Bayaderes: Allegretto.
II. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmir:
Moderato con moto.

EUGEN D'ALBERT.

OVERTURE to Grillparzer's "Esther." op. 8.
(First time.)

Soloist:

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

The performance of the orchestra in the symphony was not always up to the high standard that has characterized the concerts of late. But the music itself is so passionate, melancholy and noble, that hearty applause followed the finale and Mr. Paur was recalled.

Mr. Busoni gave a remarkable exhibition of technique. The most difficult passages were played with apparent ease and with grace. In the piece by Weber, which, I believe, has not been played at a Symphony Concert since '85, when Mr. George M. Nowell was the pianist, there was an occasional lack of pronounced rhythm, as in the opening of the finale; but, on the whole, Mr. Busoni's performance was remarkable for its precision, power and brilliancy. The pianist enlivened the second movement with embellishments, joining with the orchestra in the march, and although purists might object to Weber improved, the audience enjoyed the modern version. Mr. Busoni is by no means alone in this treatment of the march.

The Spanish Rhapsody, as arranged by Mr. Busoni and played by him, is great sport. There is no need here of debating the question whether the true characteristics of the Jota are preserved in this Liszt-Busoni machine. It is sufficient to say that Busoni has given the piano piece a gorgeously colored and highly fantastic dress. It was a great evening for the men who deal in percussion, and there was a most diversified exhibition of musical fireworks from cannon crackers to sky-scraping rockets, from pin-wheels to set-pieces of intricate construction. Mr. Busoni did what he pleased with the piano. The harder the task, the more demoniac his agility. All forms of technical exercises known as supreme and transcendental were playthings in his fingers. His reception was hearty, and the applause that followed his feats was long continued and loudly sustained. The evening, when Mr. Busoni was on the stage, was one of bravura rather than of temperament. Mr. Busoni has in times past in this city, which should have kept him as her citizen, risen to a greater musical height; he has afforded an audience greater and purer musical pleasure, but he has never, at least in public, given so remarkable an exhibition of modern technique as he did last evening.

PHILIP HALE.

ABOUT MUSIC.

The Passing of the Celebrated Ferruccio Busoni.

Found ————— July 11, 94
A Singular Commentary on
Parochial Taste.

An Olla Podrida of Musical News and Gossip.

Ferruccio Busoni, pianist and composer, proposes to return to Europe. I hear that he will not visit this country again until '96 or '97. During his stay in the United States he has been recognized as a pianist of the first rank, so far as technical proficiency and artistic sincerity are concerned; but his stay here has not brought him substantial or even adequate pecuniary reward.

Now Busoni at the age of 10 years (1876) was loudly praised when he appeared before the Vienna public. Hanslick then spoke of his musical nature and uncommon memory, and encouraged him in the field of composition. In 1881 his native city gave him a gold medal. In 1884 the Philharmonic Academy of Bologna granted him the Master's diploma, "a distinction which had not been won by so young an artist since Mozart." In 1890 he won the composer's prize ($1000) given by Rubinstein to the best pianist composer, appearing in an international contest before a jury of musicians selected from the different musical countries of the world. He was immediately made a professor in the higher grades of piano instruction at the Imperial Conservatory of Moscow, Russia.

It was in 1891 that Busoni came to the United States and settled in Boston. His first appearance at a concert of note was at a Symphony concert, Nov. 14, 1891. It is not now necessary to review the remarkable characteristics and the limitations of this pianist.

But it may be said, and it should be said, that after he left the New England Conservatory, Mr. Busoni, a European celebrity, with the greatest difficulty made both ends meet. He is a temperate, economical, industrious man, and his failure can in no way be attributed to his personal foible or fault. This pianist, whose technique surpasses that of Paderewski, could not in this town of culture give concerts with marked pecuniary success. This teacher, whose merits were appreciated in European cities, did not find here pupils enough to pay his modest expenses.

He left Boston last fall and lived in New York. How he fared there I do not know, but his intention is to leave the country in a few months or weeks.

Is it not a sad and an ironical commentary on the condition of art in the United States that the explanation of his ill fortune is, according to his friends' and his own belief, this: He was not properly introduced?

In other words, European reputation and a public display of ability, rare even in these days, are as nothing. The question is not, "How does he play?" The question is this: "Did he bring a letter of introduction to Mr. X, the wealthy amateur, or to Mrs. Y, the enthusiastic pater-on-the-back of mediocrity?"

Mr. Busoni is certainly one of the ablest virtuosos that Boston has ever heard, but he is not by any means a sympathetic player. He may equal Paderewski in celerity and precision of execution but he is a long way from him in sentiment and color. And when he does fairly pitch in for vehemence, he can get as violently metallic, harsh and ugly noises out of the strings as anybody on record. One cannot then envy the owners of the piano, whose character for endurance he is establishing at the expense of its credit for beauty. But he is quite a "wizard of the key-board" all the same, and there are few really great players who duplicate Mr. Baermann's avoidance of all banging.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 3, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 8, in F major, op. 93.

- I. Allegro vivace e con brio.
- II. Allegretto scherzando
- III. Tempo di menuetto.
- IV. Allegro vivace.

C. M. LOEFFLER.

CONCERTO FANTASTIQUE, for VIOLONCELLO and ORCHESTRA. (MS.)

Allegro.
Adagio.
Allegro.—Theme russe: Poco Allegretto.—Presto.
(First time.)

RUBINSTEIN.

BALLET-MUSIC from "Feramors."

- I. Dance of Bayaderes: Allegretto.
- II. Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmir: Moderato con moto.

EUGEN D'ALBERT.

OVERTURE to Grillparzer's "Esther." op. 8.
(First time.)

Soloist:

MR. ALWIN SCHROEDER.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

192
NEW COMPOSITIONS AT THE SYMPHONY,
SLIVINSKY AGAIN, ETC.

The audience at the fourteenth Symphony concert evidently found its chief satisfaction in Mr. C. M. Loeffler's new composition for violoncello and orchestra, entitled by him "A Fantastic Concerto," and played with Mr. Schroeder for the soloist. It is true that Beethoven's ever fresh and favorite eighth symphony began the evening and might have been expected to so fill the mind with thought and pleasure that an orchestral composition of our day, following immediately after it, would seem tame and unremunerative. But the symphony has had better readings than that which the band gave it last night; for the men played rather as if they were relying too much upon their own familiarity with the score, so that there were roughness, inelegance, heaviness, and even inaccuracy in the performance. The audience responded with thanks, but not with enthusiasm.

Mr. Loeffler gave an intimation last winter, in the string sextette which the Kneisel Quartette played, that he is a man who has something to say and knows how to say it. This concerto enforced that affirmation. It is music of the time in its diversity of ideas and its fantasies of treatment; it passes unexpectedly from one phase to another, alternating the smoothest and calmest ensembles with the most vivacious and ecstatic individual virtuosity; it has passages in which the solo instrument is heard alone, and others in which piccolo, tuba, cymbals, triangle and harp are invoked to assist the standard orchestra. Yet it does not seem eccentric, extravagant or far fetched; the successive phases, however opposite in tone and tenor, apparently belong together, like the strange colors which lie side by side in some sunset skies. The concerto has fine changes of tempo and of theme, but there is no suspension of the continuous flow, and the disposition of the solo part against those of the orchestra is intelligent and handled with mastery, while the separate themes are interesting, easily followed and original. The score is not unlike that by Mr. Busoni, which was heard a week ago in the respect that it uses some instruments in sharp, short sallies and in quaint emphases: but it differs from it in this—that where Mr. Busoni's instrumentation was erratic, laborious and difficult to fit together, Mr. Loeffler's is natural, fluent, and emerges from the instruments with the suggestion that each odd little bit is just where it ought to be, can be found without anxiety and presented with facility. The solo part is of immense difficulty as well as of frequent beauty, and even Mr. Schroeder's eminent virtuosity was none too much for the brilliant variations upon the Russian theme of the fourth part, nor for the extraordinary long and elaborate cadenza. The concerto was greatly applauded and both composer and player were personally applauded.

The ballet music from Rubinstein's "Feramors" followed, and it was pleasant to notice that Mr. Loeffler's scoring did not suffer in comparison with the poetic and fanciful treatment of these dances.

The concert ended with another novelty—D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther." Without knowing something about what kind of a thing that "Esther" is—and the programme book was silent as usual upon a subject about which its readers must be personally ignorant and without ready means of informing themselves—it is not possible to say how well this overture does its duty. But in itself, although of clever mechanical construction, it is not particularly interesting and gives little to remember. It has a rather sturdy introduction with some brass and a good deal of drum. Then there is a slower and prettier part, mildly tinged with the romantic; another phase, in which a tripping or trotting figure is recognizable; and a full and resonant, but by no means dramatic or exciting, conclusion. The listener can assume that the theme is Biblical and fit on at his pleasure, the pomp of Ahasuerus, the soft persuasions of Esther, the insinuations of Haman, the cavalcade of Mordecai and the imperious judgment which rounds out the Hebrew story. Having done which, he may find that he is all wrong. But all the same, any one of a dozen bright and gay French overtures would have given a nicer ending to the concert, which was pleasantly brief.

There will be no concert next week, but for the succeeding week the programme assigns to the orchestra together with Brahms's second symphony, these novelties—Hartmann's "Nordische Heerfahrt" overture and Tchaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Francesca di Rimini." Mr. Loeffler will be the soloist and he will introduce new violin pieces by Bruch and Saint-Saens.

93
MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

Not since the days of Henschel as conductor, have there been so many novelties upon our symphonic programmes. The concert of Saturday gave a new violoncello concerto and an unfamiliar overture, while the next programme is to present Hartmann's "Nordische Heerfahrt," Bruch's "Romanza" for violin, St. Saens' "Morcean de Concert" for the same instrument, and Tchaikowsky's symphonic poem, "Francesca di Rimini," an array of novelties sufficient to appal the reviewer and to delight the general auditor.

The concert of Saturday began with Beethoven's eighth symphony. This is the "humorous symphony" par excellence, and it is pleasant to note that most of the playful touches were given with sufficient appreciation of their intent. The piquant ritenuto effects of the chief theme of the first movement could have had more grace, but the brusquerie of the second movement was excellently portrayed. The minuet of this symphony is an idealization of what Haydn attempted in this form, much nearer to Haydn's style than the minuet of the first symphony, but it is the only point in which the work at all resembles the older school, and even here the bold touches of horn and clarinette remove it from the older style of scoring. The clarinette was played too forcibly, but the horn was perfect in this as in other works of the programme. The finale went brilliantly, the chattering figure of the chief theme was clearly read, and that sudden jump from the garret to the cellar, where the figure of the futes is answered so brusquely by the contrabasses, was given with appropriate emphasis, although the latter instruments might have had even more of gruffness; but this was a fault which proceeded from numerical weakness, for our orchestra could well bear the addition of two contrabasses, where there is such a powerful body of violins. Those comical octaves for bassoon and kettle-drum were charmingly played, the drummer repressing himself for a single and only time, for which he repaid himself by playing more forcibly than ever through the rest of the concert. Per contra, the bassoon might have been more prominent in this symphony; if ever there was a bassoon symphony, it is this. Beethoven loved the bassoon as Weber loved the horn. He cared little however, for that earnest side of the instrument, which Meyerbeer brought out in the rising of the nuns, in "Robert le Diable," or Berlioz in the "March to Execution," but enjoyed its humor, and was, as he termed it, "aufgeknoepft," when he wrote obligato effects for this clown of the orchestra. The tuning of the drums in octaves was a new device in its time, yet Beethoven, from the very first symphony, showed a disposition to do new things with the kettle-drums, and had already tuned in sixths in his seventh symphony.

A violoncello concerto composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler came next, and was brilliantly performed by Mr. Alwin Schroeder. It is difficult to speak fairly of this work on a first hearing, but it seems as if one might give the poet's advice, to the composer:—

"Be bold! be bold! be not too bold."

For there is a constant boldness in the treatment and modulation that causes the auditor mental effort at every turn; it is too modern in its progressions and some of its orchestral combinations are experimental. The passages for flute and cello sounded empty and some of the piccolo work suggested the march of the first act of "Carmen." The work at first seemed too improvisational in flavor, it left the impression of being disjointed and spasmodic, its ideas seemed loosely strung together. The Russian finale reminded the reviewer of how much better the composer had done in his sextette, a composition which greatly overshadows this work. There was brilliancy in the solo part and to spare; if virtuosity is its own reward, then Mr. Schroeder must be quite content, for he conquered many furious difficulties in the course of the concerto. The cadenza in the finale was phenomenal, and the broad work on the C string, the clear harmonics, the double-stopped passages, were all very wonderful. There was great enthusiasm at the close, and both the performer and the composer were applauded to the echo. Mr. Schroeder had played finely, and Mr. Loeffler is respected and admired by all who have ever known him, so that the outburst was to have been expected; yet the reviewer cannot consider this concerto as the composer's best work.

One should feel grateful to Mr. Paur for giving such music as the ballet numbers from Rubinstein's "Feramors"; it is not below the dignity of these concerts to have such pretty numbers once in a while, and if these musical dainties might be followed by such numbers as St. Saens' "Suite Algerienne," Massenet's "Dimanche au Village," etc., it would give an added charm to the concerts.

The "Feramors" ballet music is far more graceful and characteristic than that which the same composer has given in "The Demon," and its delicacy was splendidly brought out by the orchestra. It was given with a praiseworthy perfection of ensemble and shading.

The concert ended with D'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," which was a work showing that there are lofty possibilities in the great pianist. The themes were ponderous, and there was strong dramatic contrast evident; at times the rhythmic changes and syncopations seemed to promise a Schumann, but at the end it left no very definite impression. Some of the climaxes were well wrought up, but the art of concealing art had not been attained in the work. It was broadly and majestically played, and the excellence of the horn and oboe work deserves especial mention.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Mr. Paur, whom some of the newspaper reviewers of concerts here first reproved for severity, even pedantry, is now charged with unbecoming levity in the performance of two dances from Rubinstein's "Feramors" at the concert by the Boston orchestra on Thursday. Such trifles, he is informed, are unworthy the dignity of a symphony concert in serious-minded New York. They may have their place in floppant Boston, where, it should have been added, there are no Sunday evening concerts with ballet-music to satiety.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Alwyn Schroeder.

The "Hera Novissima" and "Christus" Tonight—The Opera Season—Mr. Grossmith Once More—"Isle of Champagne" for Last Time—Final Shtvinski Recital—News Notes.

The novelty in the Symphony concert programme of last evening, played at Music Hall by the Boston orchestra, was Mr. C. N. Loeffler's "Fantastic Concerto," for violin-cello and orchestra, which is still in manuscript.

Mr. Loeffler's popularity as one of the leading violins of the orchestra gives a peculiar interest to any composition which he contributes at these concerts, and in this new concerto he has quite fully realized the expectations of those who are familiar with his earlier contributions to local programmes. Mr. Loeffler is a capital musician, with a thorough knowledge of the art of composition, possessed of good taste in the choice of forms, and a master in orchestration. All these characteristics are shown in his concerto of last evening, and its merits were quickly recognized both by the audience and his fellow-players in the orchestra. The work is in five short movements, which are played without pause, and in the concerto he has made use of some grand and imposing themes, which are treated in a masterly fashion. He introduces a cadenza for the solo 'cello which is full of difficult passages for the player, and demands a perfect mastery of the instrument. Mr. Loeffler was fortunate in having the solo work given to Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, whose playing throughout the concerto was equal to his best efforts in these concerts. The concerto and its performance were alike vastly enjoyed by the audience, and at its conclusion the composer and soloist were alike honored by the audience with a great ovation.

Another novelty of a less interesting character in the programme was Eugen d'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther." This composition is an ably written one, and scored for the ordinary grand orchestra. D'Albert follows conservative forms in his instrumentation, and the themes which are of striking originality are well worked out, and the overture is brought to a very effective and dramatic climax. It is, however, a work that would not generally interest an audience other than as a novelty.

Conductor Paur introduced his programme with a brilliant performance of the eighth Beethoven symphony, and also included in its numbers the "Candle Dance" and the Dance of the Bayaderes from the ballet music of "Feramors."

The orchestra makes its usual tour next week, and for Saturday evening, Feb. 17, Brahms' Symphony No. 2 and some novelties by Hartmann, Bruch, Saint-Saens and Tchaikowsky are announced, with Mr. C. M. Loeffler as soloist.

Fourteenth Symphony Program— Mme Patti's Return—Handel and Haydn Concert—Various Musical Attractions.

The program for the 14th symphony rehearsal and concert contained two novelties, Mr. C. M. Loeffler's fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra, and Eugen d'Albert's overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," both given for the first time in this city. The greater interest naturally centered in the work by the talented resident composer and violinist, Mr. Loeffler, who not only has gained an enviable position as a performer, but whose musical writings have stamped him as a composer of marked ability. Additional interest was given this new work by reason of the soloist, Mr. Alwyn Schroeder, also a member of the symphony orchestra. The composition is florid and fantastic, and the themes and variations given to the cellist bristle with difficulties and call into play about all the resources of that instrument running from double and triple chords in the bass up to harmonics in the upper scale.

The solo work is almost continuous, beginning with the first part of the florid oriental introduction. The second movement, a melancholy series of passages, was beautifully played, the cello in Mr. Schroeder's hands singing with all the delicacy and tenderness of the violin.

An elaborate cadenza in the third part, leading into a wild Russian theme, was deftly and very clearly executed, but its intricacies are so great that no one but an accomplished cellist can hope to master it satisfactorily. But few harsh or discordant notes were discernible in Mr. Schroeder's playing.

The impetuous finale was smoothly given by soloist and orchestra. At the close of the performance composer and soloist were most heartily applauded, and each one received cordial hand grips of congratulation from their conferees.

D'Albert's overture to "Esther" is a brilliant work, abounding in turbulent episodes. The brasses in the fanfares were a trifle unsteady at times, but the overture was in the main excellently performed. The tremulous accompaniments by the strings, which run all through the piece, were played with commendable absence of cloudiness, while the syncopated form of a theme in the finale received capital treatment by the four parts of the string contingent.

Beethoven's delightfully humorous eighth symphony was daintily and sympathetically played. Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramors" was given trippingly and lightly. The program for the next concerts, Feb. 16 and 17, is as follows: Brahms, second symphony; Hartmann, overture, "Nordische Heerfahrt;" violin solos, Bruch's romance, op. 42 and Saint-Saens' concert piece, played by Mr. Loeffler; Tchaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini."

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the fourteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Beethoven: Symphony No. 8, in F major, Opus 93.
C. M. Loeffler: Concerto fantastique for violoncello and orchestra (MS.)
Rubinstein: Candle-dance of the Brides of Kashmir and Dance of Bayaderes No. 1, from "Feramors."
Eugen d'Albert: Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," Opus 8.
Mr. Alwyn Schroeder was the cellist.

The performance of the eighth symphony—the "humorous" symphony par excellence—was one of the finest we have heard. The playing was technically smooth, finished and exact in ensemble, and there was a nervous vigor of accent, a general brightness and vivacity about the performance, that made every point tell. The humorous strokes were particularly well made; notably good was the way in which that wonderful passage near the end of the last movement was given, where the 'celli and basses take the melodious second theme out of the wood-wind's mouth, and, as Ambros says, "can not help singing and growing it after it with terrific sentimentality;" the full humor of the passage was shown, yet without falling into mere burlesque or parody.

The two movements from Rubinstein's "Feramors" ballet-music were given with more distinction of effect than we can remember to have heard them before; the music, with all its grace and piquancy, verges dangerously on the commonplace, and Rubinstein's instrumentation is in general not of a sort to cure or veil this to any great extent. Upon the whole it may be said that Rubinstein's habitual handling of the orchestra is not very easy to be accounted for; he often seems distinctly bent on not laying himself open to the charge of anything like super-refinement or dandyism—the last vein in the world into which a man with his talent for the slipshod was in any danger of falling. If his orchestration keeps quite clear of that rather wholesale, monotonous and cloying gorgeousness one finds in men like Goldmark, it also seldom, if ever, has the captivating, delicate espièglerie so characteristic of many writers of the modern French school; and, what is most curious, this latter quality seems just what would best fit a good deal of his music, notably the two ballet movements in question. But he seems determined to confine himself, so to speak, to mere primary colors, to sharp contrasts between masses of strings with masses of horn-tone, or not particularly well blended masses of wood wind; that clever and, as the French say, savant blending of colors, those delicate tertiary tints of which Saint-Saens, Bizet, and Wagner—to mention no others—are so fond, are for the most part absent from his palette. But, as the two movements were played last Saturday evening, we must say that we had never heard his instrumentation sound so well and charming.

Eugen d'Albert's overture to "Esther" is a work which at once inspires respect. It is worked out elaborately, with great care and conscientiousness, yet wholly without ostentation; one feels that the young composer well appreciated the true character of his task, that his good workmanship had a higher aim than merely to show what he could do, for, with all its thoroughness, it is never excessive, he never loses sight of the essentially dramatic character of his composition, and does not let an over-anxiety for elaboration betray him into obscuring the larger outlines of his work, nor into forgetfulness of the bolder methods of dramatic musical development. In a word, he keeps his balance, between the purely musical on the one hand, and the impressively dramatic on the other, remarkably well. Of especially distinguished melodic invention he shows perhaps not very much; yet his themes have character, they are not vulgar nor trivial, and, best of all, they are really themes—not merely impressive or emotional phrases, whose only value lies in their immediate effect, but melodic passages that contain within themselves the germs of further development and growth. The whole overture shows great seriousness of purpose and nobility of aim; one would much like to hear it again. It was grandly played.

Mr. Loeffler's new "Fantastic" concerto—its original title, by the way, was simply "Morceau fantastique"—seems to us to come nearer to a solution of an "irreducible case of Cardan" than any other modern composition of the sort we have heard. For writing such a piece Mr. Loeffler may be said to possess quite peculiar qualifications; if not specifically a 'cellist, he is a violinist, that is a string player, well versed in the technique of stringed instruments and with a good deal of native sympathy with the virtuosic aspect of string playing—like enough, too, he plays the 'cello itself more than any of us know—he can thus get a certain amount of inspiration from the very character and quality of the instrument he writes for. His melodic inventiveness can fall easily and naturally into the 'cello vein. Then he is a composer to the manner born; he has abundantly proved this before. He does not at all come within the class of virtuosos who write simply virtuosic compositions, who compose merely because they are brilliant players and want something brilliant to play. If his enthusiasm for Brahms leads him in the direction of solidity of workmanship, his admiration for the French and Slavic composers leads him quite as naturally toward brilliancy, piquancy and the highly-spiced and charming in general. He has much of the characteristically French lightness of touch, of their instinctive knowing when they have said enough, while his German side saves him from their too frequent contentment with half-expressed ideas, with mere clever innuendoes.

If in this 'cello concerto the first thing that strikes one is its immense cleverness, one finds also in it that the composer was not willing to content himself with being merely clever; he has shown all due regard for musical proportion, balance, and distinction. Of sentiment there is just enough in the work; and here more than in any other way has Mr. Loeffler shown his nice appreciation of the task he undertook. All modern 'cello concertos we know have had one or the other of two serious defects: either they have been the work of virtuoso cellist, effectively and gratefully written for the solo instrument, but devoid of musical ideas and true sentiment of any sort, or else they have been the work of real composers, worthy of the name, who had ideas to express and genuine sentiment to start with, but found the 'cello a most uncomfortable and thankless medium. In listening to concertos of the first class, one wishes heartily that they had never been written; in listening to those of the second, one longs to ask the 'cello kindly to stop and not interfere with the music. Mr. Loeffler seems to have had the extraordinary luck—or artistic skill, if you will—to walk safely between this Scylla and Charybdis. He has musical ideas and expresses them musically; but they are essentially 'cello ideas, melodic forms and phrases that absolutely call for the 'cello to give them life. And note this, that, in so far as sentiment and the emotional in general are concerned, although he shows no little warmth and beauty of feeling, he wisely avoids entering upon such deeper and more poignant emotional regions as would make the voice of a single 'cello seem inadequate, and make you long for the stronger and richer expressive power of the full orchestra. The ever-recurring presence and predominance of the fantastic element in his work saves him from this. He goes into the emotional only just as far as the 'cello will easily and naturally carry him; when he has reached this limit, he returns to the light and fancifully piquant, to the graceful and enchanting. In a word, he cuts his coat according to his cloth. And this is why we lay such stress upon his cleverness. He has written a composition that is at once interesting and charming in itself, and effective and thankful for the 'cello, both in its sentimental aspect as a singer of expressive cantilena and in the way of giving the player every chance of displaying such virtuosity as his instrument admits of.

Mr. Schroeder—to whom the concerto is dedicated, by the way—fairly outdid himself in his performance of the work. Indeed it was evident that he had a task before him which he could perform equally con amore as a 'cellist and as a musician. In point of beauty of tone, purity of intonation and, in short, all that goes to make up a fine 'cello technique, his playing was impeccable; while his graceful, artistic phrasing, his penetrating sentiment in cantilena and brilliancy in bravura passages called for the heartiest recognition and admiration. It was superb playing at every point, and was exuberantly recognized as such by the audience. Both 'cellist and composer had a real ovation.

And has this concerto of Mr. Loeffler's really reconciled us to the 'cello concerto in general, as a form that can withstand the tooth of time? In one sense, yes; in another, decidedly, no! The very success with which he has accomplished the task of writing an acceptable one shows what an abnormal task it essentially was. A form of composition in which a composer of recognizably high and noble aspirations, a man who is primarily a "Brahmsianer," and only secondarily a Gallo-Slav, has to draw so enormously and constantly on his cleverness has to be so clever all the time, at the risk of falling into nothingness and extinction, is not a form to which he can feel himself bound by any very deep-going ties. Mr. Loeffler can be very charming and fascinating in it, but he cannot find room for the whole of himself in it. Indeed, he knew enough not to try to. And think what a risk he ran! Swelling what was essentially of the nature of bright musical vers de société to well nigh epic proportions! Let him rest well content with his success this time; for neither the lightning nor any other form of electricity strikes twice in the same place. He has achieved the all-but-impossible in the most brilliant way: now let him write some more quartets or sextets, and if he should try an overture we, for one, should be by no means sorry.

The next programme (for Feb. 16 and 17, there is no concert this week) is: Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73; Hartmann, overture, "Nordische Heerfahrt;" Bruch, romanza for violin, opus 42; Saint-Saëns, morceau de concert for violin; Tschaiikowsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

MUSIC.

Saville

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphony in F, No. 8, Beethoven; Concerto Fantastique, for violoncello and orchestra (MS.), C. M. Loeffler (first time); Ballet Music, "Feramorz, Rubinstein; Overture "Esther," E. d'Albert (first time.) The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The Symphony was beautifully read, the tempi were faultless, and the playing throughout was of the finest. In listening to Mr. Loeffler's concerto, it is necessary to remember the qualification "Fantastique" that is attached to it. The work has evidently been composed with great thought and care. It is strikingly new, is admirable in its contrasts of orchestral tone color, and the instrumentation is often surprising in its fresh combinations. It is well divided between the orchestra and the solo instrument and forms a strongly welded whole. It is so full of novel effects that more than a single hearing is necessary to a complete appreciation of its merit. The style is wholly modern. The opening movement is broad and dignified in its general aspect; but occasionally it is exceedingly brilliant. The themes are gracefully melodious, and their development is as ingenious as it is interesting. The slow movement has a fascinating theme, of rare refinement, and abounds in lovely moments, especially in the instrumentation. The finale is founded on a very brief theme in the Russian style, and is elaborately developed through variations for the solo instrument and the orchestra. It is remarkable for the variety of treatment to which it is subjected, and for the clearness that sways all its intricacies. Here the solo cello and the other instruments are used in the most brilliant manner. It is impossible to do full justice to the concerto in the brief space we have at our command, but we have room to say that it is creditable in every way to the fine musicianship of its composer and is a work upon which he may justly pride himself. The solo part bristles with difficulties, but they were overcome in a masterly manner by Mr. Schroeder, whose skill has never been evidenced more convincingly than it was in his performances on this occasion. The work was listened to with rapt attention, and though it is somewhat long, interest in it never flagged. At its end the audience broke into a spontaneous outburst of applause, and recalled the soloist again and again, and also paid enthusiastic tribute to the composer, who seemed modestly bent on keeping himself in the background. The pretty "Feramorz" music was exquisitely played. The D'Albert overture is a clearer work than we expected from its composer. It is not extravagantly modern, is fairly melodious and is richly scored. There is nothing to be said against it, except that it is noisy and uninteresting. The programme for the next concert is Symphony No. 2, Brahms; a new overture by Hartmann; two solos for violin, one by Bruch and one by Saint Saëns; and Tschaiikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini. The soloist is Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

MUSIC, Journal

The Fourteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening, Mr. Paur conductor, in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 8..... Beethoven
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra (MS.)
(First time)..... C. M. Loeffler
Ballet Music, "Feramorz"..... Rubinstein
1. Candle dance of the Brides of Cashmere.
2. Dance of Bayaderes.
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther"..... d'Albert

The symphony was well read and well played. The famous allezretto scherzando that is said to have made Schopenhauer forget that the world was nothing but a receiving vault of hopes and illusions was given delightfully, and it was a pleasure to find Mr. Paur believing in the theory that the third movement was intended to be played as an old-fashioned symphonic menuet.

It was also a great pleasure to hear again extracts from the beautiful ballet music in "Feramorz." The operas of Rubinstein are not long-lived, and they will probably only be remembered on account of the ballet music, as in "Feramorz," "Nero" and "The Demon," just as for a long time the famous overture of Mendelssohn served the name of an unsuccessful opera. The music played last evening is exquisite in conception and in instrumentation. "Too frivolous," I hear some one say. But, good sir, or sweet madam, do you wish to listen to symphonies and symphonic poems and long-winded concertos with cadenzas of still longer wind all the time? Because Brahms lives, must Auber apologize for his own birth, life and death? Because Dvorak is a musician of great talent, has Bizet or Delibes no right to musical existence? Such music as this ballet in "Feramorz" shows imagination and refined technical skill. And let it here be said that any one of a half dozen, at least, of Auber's overtures is more deserving of a place in a Symphony concert than the miscamach known to men as d'Albert's overture to "Esther."

The fastidious Gericke knew the value of these voluptuous dances by Rubinstein. They were last played here in a Symphony concert in October, 1885. Would that Mr. Paur would let us hear Delibes's charming suite "Le roi s'amuse," in which ancient dance-forms are clothed in sympathetic, adorning and not impertinent, not incongruous dress.

Mr. Loeffler is well known to us all as an admirable violinist and a composer of ingenuity and refined taste. He has named his concerto "fantastic" and with reason; the music seems like the sleep-changes of a fanciful musician. There is much in this work that is imaginative and ingenious; perhaps, on account of its title, it is wrong to crave a little more solidity in thought and in treatment. Mr. Loeffler here seems to me to be a symbolist; not grim and cruel like Maeterlinck and some of his French neighbors, but a man of fine and wandering fancy, who uses words chiefly for their rhythm and color. The greatest charm in his work is the piquant instrumentation; and yet right here there is an absence of fullness, when well-nourished inner parts would fill the longing of the hearer. That which follows the beginning of the adagio seems the stronger part of the work. The theme (Russian, as stated by the program book), is not particularly attractive, and the variations are not all interesting. The impression made after one hearing is that Mr. Loeffler was not fortunate in securing a first-class melodic idea. But his work, in tuoso 'cellists, effectively and gratefully written for the solo instrument, but devoid of musical ideas and true sentiment of any sort, or else they have been the work of real composers, worthy of the name, who had ideas to express and genuine sentiment to start with, but found the 'cello a most uncomfortable and thankless medium. In listening to concertos of the first class, one wishes heartily that they had never been written; in listening to those of the second, one longs to ask the 'cello kindly to stop and not interfere with the music. Mr. Loeffler seems to have had the extraordinary luck—or artistic skill, if you will—to walk safely between this Scylla and Charybdis. He has musical ideas and expresses them musically; but they are essentially 'cello ideas, melodic forms and phrases that absolutely call for the 'cello to give them life. And note this, that, in so far as sentiment and the emotional in general are concerned, although he shows no little warmth and beauty of feeling, he wisely avoids entering upon such deeper and more poignant emotional regions as would make the voice of a single 'cello seem inadequate, and make you long for the stronger and richer expressive power of the full orchestra. The ever-recurring presence and predominance of the fantastic element in his work saves him from this. He goes into the emotional only just as far as the 'cello will easily and naturally carry him; when he has reached this limit, he returns to the light and fancifully piquant, to the graceful and enchanting. In a word, he cuts his coat according to his cloth. And this is why we lay such stress upon his cleverness. He has written a composition that is at once interesting and charming in itself, and effective and thankful for the 'cello, both in its sentimental aspect as a singer of expressive cantilena and in the way of giving the player every chance of displaying such virtuosity as his instrument admits of.

Mr. Schroeder—to whom the concerto is dedicated, by the way—fairly outdid himself in his performance of the work. Indeed it was evident that he had a task before him which he could perform equally con amore as a 'cellist and as a musician. In point of beauty of tone, purity of intonation and, in short, all that goes to make up a fine 'cello technique, his playing was impeccable; while his graceful, artistic phrasing, his penetrating sentiment in cantilena and brilliancy in bravura passages called for the heartiest recognition and admiration. It was superb playing at every point, and was exuberantly recognized as such by the audience. Both 'cellist and composer had a real ovation.

And has this concerto of Mr. Loeffler's really reconciled us to the 'cello concerto in general, as a form that can withstand the tooth of time? In one sense, yes; in another, decidedly, no! The very success with which he has accomplished the task of writing an acceptable one shows what an abnormal task it essentially was. A form of composition in which a composer of recognizably high and noble aspirations, a man who is primarily a "Brahmsianer," and only secondarily a Gallo-Slav, has to draw so enormously and constantly on his cleverness has to be so clever all the time, at the risk of falling into nothingness and extinction, is not a form to which he can feel himself bound by any very deep-going ties. Mr. Loeffler can be very charming and fascinating in it, but he cannot find room for the whole of himself in it. Indeed, he knew enough not to try to. And think what a risk he ran! Swelling what was essentially of the nature of bright musical vers de société to well nigh epic proportions! Let him rest well content with his success this time; for neither the lightning nor any other form of electricity strikes twice in the same place. He has achieved the all-but-impossible in the most brilliant way: now let him write some more quartets or sextets, and if he should try an overture we, for one, should be by no means sorry.

The next programme (for Feb. 16 and 17, there is no concert this week) is: Brahms, symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 73; Hartmann, overture, "Nordische Heerfahrt;" Bruch, romanza for violin, opus 42; Saint-Saëns, morceau de concert for violin; Tchaikowsky, symphonic poem, "Francesca da Rimini," opus 32. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the violinist.

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: Symphony in F, No. 8, Beethoven; Concerto Fantastique, for violoncello and orchestra (MS.), C. M. Loeffler (first time); Ballet Music, "Feramorz, Rubinstein; Overture "Esther," E. d'Albert (first time.) The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder. The Symphony was beautifully read, the tempi were faultless, and the playing throughout was of the finest. In listening to Mr. Loeffler's concerto, it is necessary to remember the qualification "Fantastique" that is attached to it. The work has evidently been composed with great thought and care. It is strikingly new, is admirable in its contrasts of orchestral tone color, and the instrumentation is often surprising in its fresh combinations. It is well divided between the orchestra and the solo instrument and forms a strongly welded whole. It is so full of novel effects that more than a single hearing is necessary to a complete appreciation of its merit. The style is wholly modern. The opening movement is broad and dignified in its general aspect; but occasionally it is exceedingly brilliant. The themes are gracefully melodious, and their development is as ingenious as it is interesting. The slow movement has a fascinating theme, of rare refinement, and abounds in lovely moments, especially in the instrumentation. The finale is founded on a very brief theme in the Russian style, and is elaborately developed through variations for the solo instrument and the orchestra. It is remarkable for the variety of treatment to which it is subjected, and for the clearness that sways all its intricacies. Here the solo cello and the other instruments are used in the most brilliant manner. It is impossible to do full justice to the concerto in the brief space we have at our command, but we have room to say that it is creditable in every way to the fine musicianship of its composer and is a work upon which he may justly pride himself. The solo part bristles with difficulties, but they were overcome in a masterly manner by Mr. Schroeder, whose skill has never been evidenced more convincingly than it was in his performances on this occasion. The work was listened to with rapt attention, and though it is somewhat long, interest in it never flagged. At its end the audience broke into a spontaneous outburst of applause, and recalled the soloist again and again, and also paid enthusiastic tribute to the composer, who seemed modestly bent on keeping himself in the background. The pretty "Feramorz" music was exquisitely played. The D'Albert overture is a clearer work than we expected from its composer. It is not extravagantly modern, is fairly melodious and is richly scored. There is nothing to be said against it, except that it is noisy and uninteresting. The programme for the next concert is Symphony No. 2, Brahms; a new overture by Hartmann; two solos for violin, one by Bruch and one by Saint Saëns; and Tchaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini. The soloist is Mr. C. M. Loeffler.

MUSIC.

The Fourteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony Concert given last evening, Mr. Paur conductor, in Music Hall, was as follows:

Symphony No. 8.....Beethoven
Fantastic concerto for 'cello and orchestra (MS.)
(First time).....C. M. Loeffler
Ballet Music, "Feramorz".....Rubinstein
1. Candle dance of the Brides of Cashmere.
2. Dance of Bayaderes.
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther".....d'Albert

The symphony was well read and well played. The famous allegretto scherzando that is said to have made Schopenhauer forget that the world was nothing but a receiving vault of hopes and illusions was given delightfully, and it was a pleasure to find Mr. Paur believing in the theory that the third movement was intended to be played as an old fashioned symphonic menuet.

It was also a great pleasure to hear again extracts from the beautiful ballet music in "Feramorz." The operas of Rubinstein are not long-lived, and they will probably only be remembered on account of the ballet music, as in "Feramorz," "Nero" and "The Demon," just as for a long time the famous overture of Meul preserved the name of an unsuccessful opera. The music played last evening is exquisite in conception and in instrumentation. "Too frivolous," I hear some one say. But, good sir, or sweet madam, do you wish to listen to symphonies and symphonic poems and long-winded concertos with cadenzas of still longer wind all the time? Because Brahms lives, must Auber apologize for his own birth, life and death? Because Dvorak is a musician of great talent, has Bizet or Delibes no right to musical existence? Such music as this ballet in "Feramorz" shows imagination and refined technical skill. And let it here be said that any one of a half dozen, at least, of Auber's overtures is more deserving of a place in a Symphony concert than the misc-masch known to men as d'Albert's overture to "Esther."

The fastidious Gericke knew the value of these voluptuous dances by Rubinstein. They were last played here in a Symphony concert in October, 1885. Would that Mr. Paur would let us hear Delibes's charming suite "Le roi s'amuse," in which ancient dance-forms are clothed in sympathetic, adorning and not impertinent, not incongruous dress.

Mr. Loeffler is well known to us all as an admirable violinist and a composer of ingenuity and refined taste. He has named his concerto "fantastic" and with reason; the music seems like the sleep-chasms of a fanciful musician. There is much in this work that is imaginative and ingenious; perhaps, on account of its title, it is wrong to crave a little more solidity in thought and in treatment. Mr. Loeffler here seems to me to be a symbolist; not grim and cruel like Maeterlinck and some of his French neighbors, but a man of fine and wandering fancy, who uses words chiefly for their rhythm and color. The greatest charm in his work is the piquant instrumentation; and yet right here there is an absence of fullness, when well-nourished inner parts would fill the longing of the hearer. That which follows the beginning of the adagio seems the stronger part of the work. The theme (Russian, as stated by the program book), is not particularly attractive, and the variations are not all interesting. The impression made after one hearing is that Mr. Loeffler was not fortunate in securing a first-class melodic idea. But his work, in apite of lack of cohesion and balanced sentences, is often interesting, never cheap, vulgar, sensational. It was played with loving care and with skill by Mr. Schroeder, and player and composer were stormily applauded.

138

Mr. d'Albert's overture was first performed in this country, I believe, at a Sarasate d'Albert concert in New York, during the season of '89-'90, and under the baton of the composer. The overture was entitled originally, "Dramatic Overture," and the present title was an afterthought.

Some of us have read through the Book of Esther; and some have heard in their younger days the cantata by Mr. Butterfield (?) known as "Esther, the Beautiful Queen;" but how many in the audience last night knew Grillparzer's "Esther" well enough to be moved or instructed or reminded by d'Albert's music.

The overture is a collection of episodes. The themes are neither fresh nor beautiful nor striking, and little is done with them after they are announced. The composer plays with them as with checkermen; now he brings forward one, and now another; but he does not win the game. He is terribly in earnest, he studies carefully each move, but he has no organized plan; he moves each piece for itself, and he does not win the game, this serious man, this gnome of the piano. And now please put it back on the shelf, Mr. Paur, and let it slumber by the side of pieces by Humperdinck and Remenschnider.

The symphonic poem by Tschaiakowsky, to be played the 17th, is "Francesca da Rimini" and not "Romeo and Juliet," as announced in the program book. PHILIP HALE.

FOURTEENTH SYMPHONY.

First

First Performance of Loeffler's Concerto and "Esther" Overture.

ORCHESTRA HEARD AT ITS BEST.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, with a programme composed of the following numbers:

Symphony No. 8, in F major..... Beethoven
Fantastic Concerto, for violoncello and orchestra..... C. M. Loeffler Ballet music from "Peramors"..... Rubinstein
Overture to Grillparzer's "Esther," Op. 8..... D'Albert
Mr. Alvin Schroeder was the soloist.

The "Fantastic Concerto," by Mr. Loeffler, had its first performance on this occasion, and the "Esther" overture was played for the first time in these concerts, having been first performed in this country in New York during the season of 1889-'90 under the direction of the composer.

The playing of the orchestra on this occasion was the best that it has done under the baton of Mr. Paur. There was a fair degree of repose in the renderings, and contrasts were better marked than usual.

Mr. Paur's reading of the symphony was a highly commendable one, just what we have learned to expect from this conscientious, earnest and artistic conductor, and thorough musician, who shows proper regard for the demands of classic compositions. Mr. Paur was comparatively successful in the presentation of the nuances of the different movements. His tempi was excellent.

All that Mr. Paur needs to do now to ensure a complete success is to still further refine the renderings through gaining a still more marked degree in the gradation of tone; a more determined sustaining of sempre piano and sempre pianissimo where it occurs, not allowing a swelling or increasing of tone because of the movement of the melody or theme; and oblige the wood-wind to play the piano and pianissimo passages much softer than is now its custom, thereby completing the restoration of the former perfection of the orchestra before it was subjected to the coarse and vulgar processes of Mr. Nikisch.

There is one other item that might be profitably considered also, and that is the terrible pounding of the drums, for which Mr. Paur is responsible, for the drummer himself often uses his instruments with considerable skill and effect. But when Mr. Paur looks up at him and throws up both hands, and with a gesture of cyclonic energy summons this Hercules of the sheepskins to "let slip the dogs of war," what is the poor man to do but "lay on" for all he is worth, and when he does, it don't seem as if Sandow could increase the din if he had the job in hand.

139

I can't see that the drummer is responsible for the noise he makes under these circumstances whereby the effect is often ruined and all music destroyed, because of this horrible distortion of the percussion effect which is supposed to intensify the climax, not totally ruin it.

It may seem that I am making a much ado about nothing in paying so much attention to this matter; but when one player can ruin the best efforts of the rest of the orchestra, it demands the severest criticism. If a steam whistle was blown, or some one with stentorian voice should yell in the places where the drums so often offend, it would not be a bit more foreign to the effect than the disturbance made upon the drums in places at every concert.

We had a most excellent and artistic tympani player, Mr. Henry Simpson, during the engagements of both Mr. Henschel and Mr. Gericke. Mr. Simpson (who is still attached to the orchestra in another capacity) was also drummer during the first season of Mr. Nikisch's incumbency, but the discreet and effective manner in which he played the tympani did not suit Mr. Nikisch's ideas of noise, and as Mr. Simpson would not abuse his instrument to please the craving of Mr. Nikisch he was supplanted by the present performer, imported by Nikisch, no doubt, to do his bidding. So it can be seen that this infernal noise that is made on the drums at times is chargeable to Mr. Nikisch's depraved taste, and was one of the elements of coarseness that served in reducing the automatic perfection of the orchestra that existed under Mr. Gericke to the orchestral patois that marked the state of degradation to which it sunk under the incompetent direction of his successor.

Mr. Paur has shown that he has refinement in his musical nature; now let him apply its processes to the directing of a more discreet and normally effective use of the drums in his orchestra and thereby enhance, not ruin, the effect of the playing, and render unnecessary the curses loud and deep that are heaped upon the unfortunate drummer so often by the listeners who have music in their souls and have no desire for a boiler-shop attachment to the orchestra.

The "Fantastic Concerto" by Mr. Loeffler, proved to be a work of genuine merit. It is much clearer than his suite for violin and orchestra, given two seasons ago, because it is not overelaborated. It nevertheless is quite intricate in its construction, a feature of Mr. Loeffler's style in composition. It is highly finished in its every part, and is most skilfully handled in the working out. It is in the modern school, wholly, both as regards the composition and the instrumentation; it is also delightful in its contrasts and replete with melodious themes. A spirit of refinement pervades the music and the composer's effort is spontaneous. Mr. Schroeder played the solo part in a masterly manner, fairly eclipsing all his previous efforts, exhibiting a degree of virtuosity that few believed this sterling player possessed. Both the soloist and the composer were enthusiastically applauded and recalled again and again.

200
The performance of the orchestra part was admirable under the careful direction of Mr. Paur.

To the severely classical the selections from the "Peramors" ballet music may seem a sort of "gumdrop offering" in the programme of a symphony concert, but the liberal, critical listener will thank Mr. Paur for this exquisite bit, for to the audience it was as refreshing as a breath of fresh air to the suffocating passengers in an almost hermetically sealed electric car on a cold morning. Mr. Paur could not ensure his popularity so quickly and at the same time be serving the cause of true art so well as to introduce into each and every programme one such number, which should include occasionally a waltz of Strauss or Gungl as very proper material.

Even that prince of martinets, Dr. Von Bulow, upholds such a contrasting element in the programme of a symphony concert.

The "Esther" overture of D'Albert was a better composition than many thought this eminent pianist capable of producing. Although there seemed to be a lack of continuity of purpose in the plan of the work, there still was much to admire, if it were not excitingly interesting. There were melodious themes and some fine effects in the instrumentation. It leaned more to the quasi-modern school than to the ultra-modern form of treatment. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for showing us this composition, even if we had not the least idea of what Grillparzer's "Esther" is all about, the programme book not being able to furnish any information.

Altogether the programme of this concert was an interesting one, and showed that Mr. Paur is not going to be partisan in his selections.

There will be no concert this week, but for Saturday evening, Feb. 17, another interesting programme is announced, to wit: Symphony No. 2, Brahms; Overture,

"Nordische Heerfahrt," Hartmann; Romanza for violin, op. 42, Bruch; Morceau de Concert for Violin, Saint-Saens; Symphonic poem, "Francesca di Rimini," Tschaiikowsky. All but the Brahms number will be played for the first time. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

201
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 2.
HARTMANN.	OVERTURE, "Nordische Heerfahrt." (First time.)
BRUCH.	SOLI FOR VIOLIN. ROMANZA, op. 42. (First time.)
SAINT-SAËNS.	MORCEAU de CONCERT. (First time.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Romeo and Juliet." (First time.)

Soloist:

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

200
The performance of the orchestral part was admirable under the careful direction of Mr. Paur.

To the severely classical the selections from the "Feramors" ballet music may seem a sort of "gumdrop offering" in the programme of a symphony concert, but the liberal, critical listener will thank Mr. Paur for this exquisite bit, for to the audience it was as refreshing as a breath of fresh air to the suffocating passengers in an almost hermetically sealed electric car on a cold morning. Mr. Paur could not ensure his popularity so quickly and at the same time be serving the cause of true art so well as to introduce into each and every programme one such number, which should include occasionally a waltz of Strauss or Gungl as very proper material.

Even that prince of martinets, Dr. Von Bulow, upholds such a contrasting element in the programme of a symphony concert.

The "Esther" overture of D'Albert was a better composition than many thought this eminent pianist capable of producing. Although there seemed to be a lack of continuity of purpose in the plan of the work, there still was much to admire, if it were not excitingly interesting. There were melodious themes and some fine effects in the instrumentation. It leaned more to the quasi-modern school than to the ultra-modern form of treatment. Mr. Paur is to be thanked for showing us this composition, even if we had not the least idea of what Grillparzer's "Esther" is all about, the programme book not being able to furnish any information.

Altogether the programme of this concert was an interesting one, and showed that Mr. Paur is not going to be partisan in his selections.

There will be no concert this week, but for Saturday evening, Feb. 17, another interesting programme is announced, to wit: Symphony No. 2, Brahms; Overture,

"Nordische Heerfahrt," Hartmann; Romanza for violin, op. 42, Bruch; Morceau de Concert for Violin, Saint-Saens; Symphonic poem, "Francesca di Rimini," Tchaikowsky. All but the Brahms number will be played for the first time. Mr. C. M. Loeffler will be the soloist.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

201
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 2.
HARTMANN.	OVERTURE, "Nordische Heerfahrt." (First time.)
	SOLI FOR VIOLIN.
BRUCH.	ROMANZA, op. 42. (First time.)
SAINT-SAËNS.	MORCEAU de CONCERT. (First time.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Romeo and Juliet." (First time.)

Soloist:

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

202

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73.

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Adagio non troppo.
- III. Allegretto grazioso, (Quasi Andantino).
- IV. Allegro con spirito.

MAX BRUCH.

ROMANZA for VIOLIN with ORCHESTRA,
in A minor. op. 42.

SAINT-SAËNS.

MORCEAU de CONCERT for VIOLIN with ORCHESTRA, in E minor, op. 62.

(First time.)

EMIL HARTMANN.

"EINE NORDISCHE HEERFAHRT," TRAUERSPIEL-OUVERTURE, in F minor, op. 25.

(First time.)

RUBINSTEIN.

"DON QUIXOTE," MUSIKALISCHES CHARAKTER-
BILD (HUMORESKE), op. 87.

(First time at these Concerts.)

Soloist:

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

203

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Symphony D, Op. 73, Brahms; Romanza in A minor for violin, Bruck; Concert Piece, E minor, for violin; Saint-Saëns; Overture, "A Northern Campaign," Hartmann; "Don Quixote," Rubinstein. The pieces by Saint-Saëns, Hartmann and Rubinstein were given for the first time at these concerts. The soloist was Mr. C. M. Loeffler. Taken for all in all, the Brahms symphony was given, on this occasion, the most coherent, the most satisfying and the most brilliant reading it has ever had here. Mr. Paur's conception of the work made the music more convincing, at least to us, than we have found it before. The Hartmann overture is a pleasing but not a particularly strong work. It is very much like a fanfare on a vast scale, though a flowing, warm and graceful second theme, finely treated, saves the composition from monotony in effect. It was broadly and impressively played. The "Don Quixote" humoresque seems to be a series of studies in orchestration, rather than any well-connected work. It is exceedingly capricious in design, but is steadily interesting, and often charming in the beauty, novelty and richness of its instrumentation. Now and then a wonderfully sonority is produced by the simplest of means, and the beauty of tone color, as well as the skilful use the composer has made of the characteristic timbres of the various instruments, especially the wood wind are often fascinating. The work was beautifully played. In fact, the performances of the orchestra throughout, left nothing to be looked for. Even the player who wields a Thor hammer on the drums, only obtruded himself once. We have never cared much for the Bruck Romanza, which is a dry, not to say dull bit of work. The Saint-Saëns concert piece, however, is quite another affair. It is true that it is a show piece, but it is full of inspiration, is admirably written for the solo instrument and is charming and interesting generally. Both selections were exquisitely played by Mr. Loeffler, with a purity of intonation, a breadth and finish of style, and a warmth of artistic feeling that were in every way delightful in effect. His performance of the Saint-Saëns piece was especially beautiful, and the cadenza he introduced toward the end is a masterly bit of work. He was vigorously applauded, and four times recalled. The programme for the next concert is: Concerto Grosso, No. 10. Handel; Symphony D, Haydn; Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven, and vocal selections. Mr. Max Heinrich is to be the soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the fifteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Brahms: Symphony No. 2, in D major, Opus 73.
Max Bruck: Romanzo for violin with orchestra, in A minor, Opus 42.
Saint-Saëns: Morceau de Concert for violin with orchestra, in E minor, Opus 62.
Emil Hartmann: "Eine nordische Heerfahrt," Overture to a Tragedy, in F minor, Opus 25.
Rubinstein: "Don Quixote," musical-character-picture (humoresque), Opus 57.
Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the violinist.

Before saying anything else about the concert let us note one point: Of the five numbers of the programme, four were new, or virtually new, to Boston. Rubinstein's "Don Quixote" was given here many years ago by Mr. Theodore Thomas: but we doubt if anybody in last Saturday evening's audience remembered a note of it, it was practically a novelty. Is not this too much of new things for one evening? Another point worth noting is that, of the three purely orchestral numbers, only one, the Brahms symphony, was a work of any importance; the Hartmann overture and the Rubinstein piece are compositions of a sort that it is worth while hearing once in a while, simply to know what they are like; one listens to them as one reads a newspaper, to find out what is going on in the world. In themselves they do not offer much of interest.

Brahms's second symphony was the first of his great orchestral works that found general favor with the public at large. The first, in C minor, was epoch-making; it was a shot that was heard round the world, and may be said to have created the Brahms party; it was soon dubbed the "Tenth Symphony"—in allusion to Beethoven's nine. But people in general found it a pretty severe dose: unquestionably it shot over the heads of nine-tenths of the public. When the second symphony, in D major, came out, it was hailed with huge delight by every "Brahmsianer," who said "that in it all the obscurity of the first was cured," and soon converted most of the doubting Thomases who had strained at swallowing the one in C minor. It is not a little curious what points first strike the public in a new work. People found the first movement in the C minor symphony so absolutely terrific that the impression it made upon them almost totally effaced that of the beautiful Andante and of the Finale, with its glorious Volkstied theme; whenever the symphony was mentioned, they thought only of the first movement, and judged it by their recollection of that. But the Ländler in the third movement of the D major symphony was found so enchanting, the two leading themes of its first movement so delicious, that these two movements made people forget that the Adagio was to the full as severe and "obscure" as the first movement in the C minor, and that the Finale was, to say the least, no clearer than the average of Brahms's writing. Thus people remembered the first symphony by what they liked least in it, the second by what they liked best.

The performance last Saturday was, to our mind, only pretty good. The work was played earnestly and in the right spirit, the tempi seemed in the main excellent; but there was a general want of smoothness and beauty of tone, many places sounded rather unsmooth and ragged, and the changes of rhythm in the last movement were not asserted with much authority. It should be said that the instrumentation of this symphony is of a nature to demand the utmost care in rehearsing the work—quite as much, if not more so than in the C minor—and a good deal of experimentalizing is necessary at rehearsals before the music can be made to sound clear and well. Many of us can remember well enough how horribly the introduction (Un poco sostenuto) of the C minor symphony used to sound in the first years of the work's appearance here, simply from a want of bringing certain parts in the score into due prominence and throwing others comparatively into the background; but, after Mr. Gericke and Mr. Nikisch had worked over it, this once terrible page sounded incomparably grand and beautiful. There is a great deal in the score of the second symphony which calls for just such careful treatment; play the notes merely as they stand on the page, and the result will often be very perplexing indeed. Beethoven's ninth symphony and Schumann's second do not require more care in adjusting the dynamic balance of the several parts of the score.

Hartmann's overture, as coming from a hard-and-fast modern Scandinavian, surprised us by its regularity of structure and persistent development; its title had led us to expect something more in the "programme" vein. There is one rather curious feature in the work: a little two-part trumpet-call that keeps coming in at odd intervals almost all through the Allegro, without ever assuming any real thematic importance or forming a structural part of the composition; the effect is very striking and brilliant. As a whole, one can not call the overture a particularly strong work: its stress and fury seem rather faits à froid, self-conscious and intentional, and none of its themes bear the stamp of recognizable individuality. It is a work that one somehow feels one has exhausted at a single hearing; if it shows talent, that is about all it shows.

Rubinstein's "Don Quixote" is a terror! We could not help recalling the account a notable French dramatic critic once gave of his sensations while witnessing a certain new tragedy; he wrote—

"About the middle of the first act, however, as I was paying closer and closer attention, I began to feel a faint pain round the temples. Little by little, consternation possessed me, for I still could not understand, in spite of my efforts. I opened my ears, gave my whole mind to it, repeated to myself the words I heard, but all to no purpose: the meaning escaped me, the words fell upon my ears like noises that flit away without forming sentences. Now the weight in my temples extended to my cranium and stiffened my neck.

"Then came boredom, moderate at first, a slight yawning hidden behind the fingers, a vague desire to think of something else; then it grew and spread, it became immense, unfathomable, limitless. Oh! boredom without hope, the crushing boredom that descends into every limb, the weight of which you feel in your hands and feet! And no possibility of escaping from this slow trisuration; the characters impose themselves upon you, you hate them, you would like to annihilate them, but their voices are like a headstrong wave that beats against, batters, and drowns the hardest heads; even when you cast down your eyes, so as not to see them, you still feel them, you think you have them on your shoulders. A public calamity, mourning, are less heavy."

The real trouble with this "Don Quixote" seems to be that Rubinstein set himself to work to write a humorous piece, without having even the faintest touch of humor in his own nature; and the effort to be humorous was so engrossing that all his musical invention left him in the lurch.

Mr. Loeffler's playing of the two pieces by Max Bruch and Saint-Saëns was exceedingly beautiful; the compositions themselves do not seem of any unusual order of merit, but they are pleasant to listen to and not without a certain charm. But his playing showed them in the finest light. The time is long since past for speaking of such matters as technique or intonation in connection with Mr. Loeffler; he has won his spurs and we take these things for granted in him. But last Saturday he played with a rich volume and warmth of tone which we had not associated with him before, with a penetrating sentiment and grace of phrasing that carried everything before them, and, in the Saint-Saëns piece, with immense brilliancy. His cadenza to the latter may stand as the last word of violin virtuosity up to date. In a word, he was superb! The audience felt it, too, and showed that they felt it.

The next programme is—Handel, concerto grosso No. 10, in D minor;—aria: Haydn, symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Härtel and Peters Eds. No. 2);—aria: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont," opus 84. Mr. Max Heinrich will be the singer.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of Saturday night made rather a heterogeneous impression, spite of the excellence of the performance, for the numbers did not seem to consort well together, and the effect of one composition seemed to be obliterated by the other. Brahms' second symphony began the concert and was finely read and played. Far less ambitious than the composer's first symphony it is yet the more pleasing work and probably contains more absolute beauty than any other of the four symphonies by Brahms. Everything was well shaded and almost every department of the orchestra deserves praise, but the horns were especially excellent, and they have much important work to do in this symphony, Brahms being almost as fond of horn effects as Weber was. The wood wind instruments were also noteworthy in the third movement. In this movement Brahms well combines the old and the new; he follows the contrasts which Beethoven established in the scherzo (originating in the minuet) but does not inflict a full repeat of the body of the work after a trio; the tendency of the so-called "classical epoch" (circa 1775-1825) was toward repetition in music, the whole tendency of the modern age is against it, and Brahms has in his intermezzo found a means of reconciling the two, a method foreshadowed by Mendelssohn in his arias, and copied by Franz in his abbreviations of Handel. Our kettle-drummer still makes strong efforts to convince the public that his instrument was intended for solo work. In the finale of the symphony he bravely held his own against vastly superior numbers. One can only echo the sentiments of the farmer over his ram who was killed in an endeavor to push over an express train, and admire the pluck while condemning the judgment displayed.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler was the soloist and instead of giving one large, presented two medium-sized, violin works. His performance was commendable. The Bruch romanza was given with pure intonation and broad and fervid style. Yet it is not a work which compares with Bruch's concertos for the same instrument, and one would much rather have heard one of these. Saint-Saëns' "Morceau de Concert" followed and was a most brilliant bit of violin pyrotechnics fitting as well to the numbers that surrounded it as a Parisian belle would in a Greek school of philosophy. One may congratulate the artist on the technique displayed. The cadenza which he composed for himself was a combination of all that is difficult in violin work; it was rather longer than would have been allowed in a concerto, but in a work largely devoted to display it was at least permissible. Every difficulty was conquered with ease; double-stopping, rapid chromatic runs, bold skips and other technical thorns were brushed aside in a manner that astonished the auditor, but, especially in the playing of harmonics did the artist deserve praise; too often one hears a thin piping tone in such passages, but here there was a full and bird-like quality, such as Wieniawski and a couple of his pupils (Musin and Lichtenberg) attained to perfection. Mr. Loeffler was applauded with an enthusiasm that was most spontaneous and long-continued. Hartmann's "Nordische Heerfahrt," which might be translated as "The Passing of the Norseman," gave a strong and gloomy picture (in overture form) of a Norse invasion; the shock of combat was often pictured and naturally there were trumpet fanfares galore. These same fanfares cause us once more to urge the necessity of having a pair of natural trumpets in our orchestra; Boston was the first to take the important step from the cornet to the trumpet, and should now make the additional stride from the keyed to the natural instrument; how much the Wagner works would gain were the fanfares given as the composer wrote them, for while Wagner used the keyed instrument freely in the orchestra, all his trumpet calls made upon the stage, all his fanfares, are written for trumpets without keys. Hartmann's overture was impressive, fairly symmetrical in the midst of its dramatic touches, and the picture of the desolation which the Vikings left behind them is strongly drawn.

Rubinstein's humoreske, "Don Quixote," sponged out the impression, however, and gave some sole on fun in a minor manner. If the reviewer objects to the position of this work on the programme, he by no means believes in banishing this school from the concerts. Very recently an eminent New York critic, Mr. Henry T. Finck of the Evening Post, wrote an eloquent plea for the admission of Strauss to our high-class programmes, and no less a classicist than Von Bulow agrees with his views. We need such things to refresh the attention occasionally, as musical appetizers, but they must be carefully placed; one would not desire the Strauss waltz just after a Beethoven symphony; and Rosinante, in this case, seemed out of place, trotting after the Viking procession. Nevertheless there were some good points made in the work, but with the Rubinsteinian prolixity and inequality. The picture of the shepherds by oboe theme and drone-bass was good, the passionate declaration of the Knight of the Woful Countenance, and the ringing laughter of the women, the sorrowful phrases of the bassoon, and the final groans of pain after the drubbing received by the convicts, all these were clear touches and were excellently played, but it was not a good key-stone to the musical arch.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The event of the 15th of the season's concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, at Music Hall last evening, under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, was the playing of Mr. C. M. Loeffler as soloist, the success made by this member of the orchestra being the greatest triumph of his entire artistic career.

Mr. Loeffler selected as the works for his appearance two novelties—Max Bruch's romanza for violin with orchestra, in A minor, op. 42, and Camille Saint-Saëns' concert piece for violin with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62—both having a first performance on this occasion.

Mr. Loeffler is, in a certain way, a Boston artist. Although he came here a well-solo player has been the result of his studious labors as a member of the Boston orchestra. It is not always easy to gain the favor from those who are acquainted with all the steps attending the progress of an artist for the element of surprise is lacking in any special success, under such circumstances; and, the certainty that good work may be anticipated, in a way detracts from the interest attending each new appearance.

It, for instance, Mr. Loeffler had been brought before his public last evening as an artist recently from the great concert halls of Europe, he would have had many advantages in gaining the favor of the audience which did not attend his appearance.

It is only a matter of justice to Mr. Loeffler to call attention to this fact, because, despite it, he gained a recognition of his abilities as a soloist which has seldom been exceeded in the appearance here of artists of world wide reputation.

His choice of the compositions named indicated a confidence in his own skill as a player, which was fully justified by the results attending his performance of them, and it is difficult to call to mind any more finished or artistic work in the way of violin solo playing in recent years than that of Mr. Loeffler on this occasion.

He is lacking in the breadth of style and largeness of tone of many soloists of his class, but the beauty of his work in the points of finish, expression, accuracy, delicacy and purity of tone fully offset these shortcomings. His playing of "Romanza," by Max Bruch, was a fit introduction to his masterly triumph in the Saint-Saens' piece, which made a revelation of Mr. Loeffler's skill, and fairly surprised even those best acquainted with his merits as a player.

Both works were highly enjoyable as additions to the somewhat untried repertoire for solo violinists, and their merits could hardly have had a better presentation than that given them by Mr. Loeffler.

His fellow-musicians vied with the members of the audience in expressing their delight at the good playing they had listened to, and Mr. Loeffler's modest recognition of the applause called out by his efforts gave further evidence of his natural avoidance of undue prominence.

Conductor Paur treated the patrons of the concerts to more new things in the way of orchestral compositions. Emil Hartmann's "A Northern Campaign," overture to a tragedy, in F minor, op. 25, and Anton Rubinstein's "Don Quixote," musical character-picture (humoresque), op. 87, both having their first performance here in this programme.

Hartmann is a living Danish composer, and a lineal descendant of musicians well known in his native land. The overture is brimful of tuneful themes, which are treated in a most original and masterly fashion, the uses made of orchestral resources showing the composer to be a thoroughly well equipped musician. The work is full of strong contrasts, and reflects the tone pictures suggested by its title in a marked fashion. It was gloriously played under Mr. Paur's direction, and made a very prominent feature of the evening's programme.

Rubinstein's "Don Quixote" proved as old a conceit in a musical way as any of the scenes depicted in the marvellous record of the valorous knight whose name it bears, and the bombastic character of the hero of the Cervantes novel was frequently given prominence in the ever shifting themes of the composition. The reading of this "humoresque" was a revelation of the resources of the orchestra, and gave a most enjoyable ending to a programme which was made unnecessarily long by the composer's own efforts. The day in playing the whole of Brahms' second symphony, instead of beginning at the third movement, where its composer's ideas first take on characteristics which make them intelligible.

Mr. Max Heinrich, baritone, is the soloist next Saturday evening, and Haydn's second symphony in D major, the Egmont overture and Handel's concerto grosso, No. 10, in D minor for strings, will be played.

Symphony Concert.

Four of the five numbers on the symphony program last week were given in this city for the first time, the Brahms symphony being the only familiar selection. The novelties were a romanza by Bruch and a concert piece by Saint-Saens, both for violin and orchestra; Emil Hartmann's overture to a tragedy, "A Northern Campaign," and Rubinstein's character picture, "Don Quixote."

The idyllic character of the first movement in the Brahms symphony was well preserved throughout, the string contingents playing grandly, and the horn phrases being generally clear and sweet. The elaborate fantasia and the coda were also admirably and sonorously given. The serious themes in the second movement and the contrasting lightness of the third were equally effective. In the latter the wood winds delivered the dainty "ländler" with charming expression. The dashing finale, with its Hungarian tone color, was played with the necessary vigor and brilliancy.

The violinist, Mr. Loeffler, played the Bruch and Saint-Saens numbers with artistic precision and seemingly without a flaw in execution. His intonation was sure and clear as a crystal, and even in the rapid runs and choral phrasing the notes were true and harmonious. The latter piece is largely given to the soloist, the orchestra forming the background. The developments are very elaborate, and Mr. Loeffler surmounted the musical difficulties with seeming ease.

His tone may be light at times, but it is sure, and the modest manner in which he performs his work as a soloist is an important factor in his success in this city. He interprets the composer's score without exaggerating for effects, and his musicianly intelligence is indisputably shown in his artistic conception and execution of any selection allotted him. He received a hearty recognition at the close of each number.

Hartmann's overture, "A Northern Campaign," is generally somber, with peculiar rhythms and trumpet calls running through it. The themes are bold and sonorous, and some of them are oddly worked out by the cello, oboes and horns. The composition, though interesting to the musician, is not one that will suit the average auditor. The orchestra gave it with good effect, the stormy coda being the most impressive part of the work.

Rubinstein's "humorous" character piece "Don Quixote" proved disappointing, and was hardly worth a place on the program, excepting as a novelty.

At the concerts this week Max Heinrich will be the vocal soloist, and the program, in addition to his arias, will be Handel's concerto in D minor for strings, Haydn's symphony No. 2, and Beethoven's overture "Egmont."

MUSIC.

The Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony orchestra given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Brahms
Romanza for violin, with orchestra, in A minor, op. 42 Bruch
Morceau de Concert for violin, with orchestra, in E minor, op. 82. (First time) Saint-Saens
"Eine Nordische Heerfahrt," Trauerspiel Overture, in F minor, op. 25. (First time) Emil Hartmann
"Don Quixote," Musikalisches Charakter-Bild (Humoreske), op. 87. (First time at these concerts) Rubinstein

The first Symphony of Brahms may be the nobler work, as some claim, but surely the second gives more musical pleasure. It is not cryptic; it goes directly to the senses, and absolute music, of which Brahms is to-day the chief exponent, needs a dash of sensuousness to appeal strongly to the average human being. Brahms, in his sterner moods, sits on a summit and weaves his musical thoughts, careless of men and women struggling, despairing and loving below; the clouds envelop him, and his song becomes obscure.

But in the D major symphony Brahms is human. He joins in the every-day life. He is in sympathy with the joys of Nature. And in his good-fellowship he borrows a phrase or two from Mendelssohn.

It is true that he is garrulous at times; but how charming is his language in the Scherzo, fresh, graceful, to the point. His thoughtfulness in the second movement does not lead to cudgeling of the brain on the part of the hearer, and the elaboration of the finale is a delight, not a distress. This symphony is among the most genial works of Brahms, and last evening it gave great pleasure to the audience. While the work of the orchestra was to be commended throughout, the performance of the scherzo was the feature of the evening. In the first movement there was a greater display of care than of brilliancy or overwhelming strength in the fantasia and in the coda.

Bruch's Romanza was dedicated to Robert Heckmann.

The program book assured the audience that Heckmann "is a prominent violinist." This statement shows the simple, honest faith of the compiler in the hereafter and its celestial joys.

In old pictures angels are represented playing on violins as well as on harps.

Heckmann is now perhaps pursuing his ancient calling.

But he fiddles no more on earth, for he died at Glasgow, Nov. 29, 1891.

Bruch's piece is without marked character or without any special beauty. It was well played by Mr. Loeffler.

The concert piece by Saint-Saens is only a showpiece, it is true, but how thoroughly musical it is; how delightfully written for solo instrument, and the instrumentation is such as is only imagined by a Frenchman; it is discreet, piquant, poetic, full of color; it is seasoned like an ideal salad. Mr. Loeffler played this show piece most charmingly. There was no calling of the attention to the difficulties, not even in his own ingenious cadenza. Technically and musically his performance was deserving of the highest praise.

Hartmann's overture is well made. The themes are not of striking originality, and the recurring fanfare reminds one of the stage directions in old English plays: "Sennet of trumpets without;" "Flourish of trumpets without." It is a "tragic overture;" the Vikings start out on their marauding to a rather jolly tune; some are killed unawares by the drums; and the rest are finished by the drums; then, there is a short moment. Hartmann is a Dane, but in this overture there is apparently little effort to rub in local color. He belongs to the school of Gade, which is Mendelssohn diluted; there is no reflection or suggestion of the new Scandinavian band of which Grieg is the chief.

Russian jokes as told in Russian novels are long, and the reader often becomes careless concerning the final point. Rubinstein took our old friend "Don Quixote" as the subject of his musical jesting. The "character-picture" has a description of its significance in a preface of text; but a panorama of different scenes in the Knight's life would be of greater advantage to the audience, if the panorama were judiciously unrolled according to signals given by the conductor.

Zabel, a biographer of Rubinstein, says that this piece should be heard with "Don Quixote" in the hand; but there are many digressions in Cervantes's immortal work, and preparatory lectures and readings would be necessary if Zabel's suggestion were taken seriously.

Rubinstein intended the work as a joke, and would be rude to his genius not to laugh heartily. But comic music without text or action is apt to breed solemnity, surprise, exhaustion, in fact anything but laughter.

Nor is it likely that anyone would imagine the music to be a sketch of Don Quixote's career, unless he were told so before the attack of the orchestra.

It is enough to say that the music as music is often ingenious and original. The instrumentation is interesting, and at times extremely effective.

The hearer may speculate at will; he may find the Knight in the bombastic orchestral utterances; he may discover the sheep, for sheep always gambol in music to certain instruments, and they browse on empty fifties; and any passionate strain announces Dulcinea in whatever disguised form she meets the Knight. PHILIP HALE.

The programme for the fifteenth Symphony concert was a trifle long, and it ended tamely at the very last; but it held a great amount of interesting matter, and of its five numbers four were absolute novelties and two were for a solo instrument. The symphony, according to Mr. Paur's usual and excellent disposition, had the first place, and was consequently heard to the best possible advantage in the freshness of the listening. Being a work of Brahms—the second, in D major,—it naturally needed the closest and clearest attention. Yet the scores of Brahms, so complicated and forbidding at first, not only clarify but also endear themselves by repetition. Not the audiences merely, but the players and conductors themselves, are constantly obtaining a better grasp upon his methods and his manners; and there are accordingly a better transference of his ideas and a larger sympathy with his purposes. This second symphony is full of beauties as well as fraught with strength, and the sweet charm of its adagio and the quaint trickery of its scherzo can hardly escape even those who cannot trace the fragments of the themes which pass in and out with changeful form and elusive modulation in the opening allegro or those who fail to follow the impetuous rush of the intermingled motives of the finale. Mr. Paur's clear head and firm hand are well suited to the exposition of Brahms, for his ten-school musician, his prominence as a solo player has been the result of his studious labors as a member of the Boston orchestra. It is not always easy to gain the favor from those who are acquainted with all the steps attending the progress of an artist for the element of surprise is lacking in any special success, under such circumstances; and, the certainty that good work may be anticipated, in a way detracts from the interest attending each new appearance.

208

It, for instance, Mr. Loeffler had been brought before his public last evening as an artist recently from the great concert halls of Europe, he would have had many advantages in gaining the favor of the audience which did not attend his appearance.

It is only a matter of justice to Mr. Loeffler to call attention to this fact, because, despite it, he gained a recognition of his abilities as a soloist, which has seldom been exceeded in the appearance here of artists of world wide reputation.

His choice of the compositions named indicated a confidence in his own skill as a player, which was fully justified by the results attending his performance of them, and it is difficult to call to mind any more finished or artistic work in the way of violin solo playing in recent years than that of Mr. Loeffler on this occasion.

He is lacking in the breadth of style and largeness of tone of many soloists of his class, but the beauty of his work in the points of finish, expression, accuracy, delicacy and purity of tone fully offset these shortcomings. His playing of "Romanza," by Max Bruch, was a fit introduction to his masterly triumph in the Saint-Saens' piece, which made a revelation of Mr. Loeffler's skill, and fairly surprised even those best acquainted with his merits as a player.

Both works were highly enjoyable as additions to the somewhat uplited repertoire for solo violinists, and their merits could hardly have had a better presentation than that given them by Mr. Loeffler.

His fellow-musicians vied with the members of the audience in expressing their delight at the good playing they had listened to, and Mr. Loeffler's modest recognition of the applause called out by his efforts gave further evidence of his natural avoidance of undue prominence.

Conductor Paur treated the patrons of the concerts to more new things in the way of orchestral compositions, Emil Hartmann's "A Northern Campaign," overture to a tragedy, in F minor, op. 25, and Anton Rubinstein's "Don Quixote," musical character-picture (humoresque), op. 87, both having their first performance here in this programme.

Hartmann is a living Danish composer, and a lineal descendant of musicians well known in his native land. The overture is brimful of tuneful themes, which are treated in a most original and masterly fashion, the uses made of orchestral resources showing the composer to be a thoroughly well equipped musician. The work is full of strong contrasts, and reflects the tone pictures suggested by its title in a marked fashion. It was gloriously played under Mr. Paur's direction, and made a very prominent feature of the evening's programme.

Rubinstein's "Don Quixote" proved as odd a conceit in a musical way as any of the scenes depicted in the marvellous record of the valorous knight whose name it bears, and the bombastic character of the hero of the Cervantes novel was frequently given prominence in the ever shifting themes of the composition. The reading of this "humoresque" was a revelation of the resources of the orchestra, and gave a most enjoyable ending to a programme which was made unnecessarily long by an adherence to the custom of the day in playing the whole of Brahms' second symphony, instead of beginning at the third movement, where its composer's ideas first take on characteristics which make them intelligible.

Mr. Max Heinrich, baritone, is the soloist next Saturday evening, and Haydn's second symphony in D major, the Egmont overture and Handel's concerto grasse, No. 10, in D minor for strings, will be played.

Symphony Concert.

Four of the five numbers on the symphony program last week were given in this city for the first time, the Brahms symphony being the only familiar selection. The novelties were a romanza by Bruch and a concert piece by Saint-Saens, both for violin and orchestra; Emil Hartmann's overture to a tragedy, "A Northern Campaign," and Rubinstein's character picture, "Don Quixote."

The idyllic character of the first movement in the Brahms symphony was well preserved throughout, the string contingents playing grandly, and the horn phrases being generally clear and sweet. The elaborate fantasia and the coda were also admirably and sonorously given. The serious themes in the second movement and the contrasting lightness of the third were equally effective. In the latter the wood winds delivered the dainty "landler" with charming expression. The dashing finale, with its Hungarian tone color, was played with the necessary vigor and brilliancy.

The violinist, Mr. Loeffler, played the Bruch and Saint-Saens numbers with artistic precision and seemingly without a flaw in execution. His intonation was sure and clear as a crystal, and even in the rapid runs and choral phrasing the notes were true and harmonious. The latter piece is largely given to the soloist, the orchestra forming the background. The developments are very elaborate, and Mr. Loeffler surmounted the musical difficulties with seeming ease.

His tone may be light at times, but it is sure, and the modest manner in which he performs his work as a soloist is an important factor in his success in this city. He interprets the composer's score without exaggerating for effects, and his musicianly intelligence is indisputably shown in his artistic conception and execution of any selection allotted him. He received a hearty recognition at the close of each number.

Hartmann's overture, "A Northern Campaign," is generally somber, with peculiar rhythms and trumpet calls running through it. The themes are bold and sonorous, and some of them are oddly worked out by the cello, oboes and horns. The composition, though interesting to the musician, is not one that will suit the average auditor. The orchestra gave it with good effect, the stormy coda being the most impressive part of the work.

Rubinstein's "humorous" character piece "Don Quixote" proved disappointing, and was hardly worth a place on the program, excepting as a novelty.

At the concerts this week Max Heinrich will be the vocal soloist, and the program, in addition to his arias, will be Handel's concerto in D minor for strings, Haydn's symphony No. 2, and Beethoven's overture "Egmont."

MUSIC.

The Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony orchestra given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony No. 2, in D major, Brahms
Romanza for violin, with orchestra, in A minor, op. 42, Bruch
Morceau de Concert for violin, with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62, (First time) Saint-Saens
"Eine Nordische Meerfahrt," Trauerspiel-Ouverture, in F minor, op. 25, (First time) Emil Hartmann
"Don Quixote," Musikalisches Charakter-Bild (Humoresque), op. 87, (First time at these concerts) Rubinstein

The first Symphony of Brahms may be the nobler work, as some claim, but surely the second gives more musical pleasure. It is not cryptic; it goes directly to the senses, and absolute music, of which Brahms is to-day the chief exponent, needs a dash of sensuousness to appeal strongly to the average human being. Brahms, in his sterner moods, sits on a summit and weaves his musical thoughts, careless of men and women struggling, despairing and loving below; the clouds enwrap him, and his song becomes obscure.

But in the D major symphony Brahms is human. He joins in the every-day life. He is in sympathy with the joys of Nature. And in his good-fellowship he borrows a phrase or two from Mendelssohn.

It is true that he is garrulous at times; but how charming is his language in the Scherzo, fresh, graceful, to the point. His thoughtfulness in the second movement does not lead to cudgeling of the brain on the part of the hearer, and the elaboration of the finale is a delight, not a distress. This symphony is among the most genial works of Brahms, and last evening it gave great pleasure to the audience. While the work of the orchestra was to be commended throughout, the performance of the scherzo was the feature of the evening. In the first movement there was a greater display of care than of brilliancy or overwhelming strength in the fantasia and in the coda.

Bruch's Romanza was dedicated to Robert Heckmann.

The program book assured the audience that Heckmann "is a prominent violinist."

This statement shows the simple, honest faith of the compiler in the hereafter and its celestial joys.

In old pictures angels are represented playing on violins as well as on harps.

Heckmann is now perhaps pursuing his ancient calling.

But he fiddles no more on earth, for he died at Glasgow, Nov. 29, 1891.

Bruch's piece is without marked character or without any special beauty. It was well played by Mr. Loeffler.

The concert piece by Saint-Saens is only a showpiece, it is true, but how thoroughly musical it is; how delightfully written for solo instrument, and the instrumentation is such as is only imagined by a Frenchman; it is discreet, piquant, poetic, full of color; it is seasoned like an ideal salad. Mr. Loeffler played this show piece most charmingly. There was no calling of the attention to the difficulties, not even in his own ingenious cadenza. Technically and musically his performance was deserving of the highest praise.

Hartmann's overture is well made. The themes are not of striking originality, and the recurring fanfare reminds one of the stage directions in old English plays: "Sennet of trumpets without;" "Flourish of trumpets without." It is a "tragic overture;" the Vikings start out on their marauding to a rather jolly tune; some are killed apparently by the drums; and the rest are finished by the songs; then there is a short lament. Hartmann is a Dane, but in this overture there is apparently little effort to rub in local color. He belongs to the school of Gade, which is Mendelssohn diluted; there is no reflection or suggestion of the new Scandinavian band of which Grieg is the chief.

Russian jokes as told in Russian novels are long, and the reader often becomes careless concerning the final point. Rubinstein took our old friend "Don Quixote" as the subject of his musical jesting. The "character-picture" has a description of its significance in a preface of text; but a panorama of different scenes in the Knight's life would be of greater advantage to the audience, if the panorama were judiciously unrolled according to signals given by the conductor.

Zabel, a biographer of Rubinstein, says that this piece should be heard with "Don Quixote" in the hand; but there are many digressions in Cervantes's immortal work, and preparatory lectures and readings would be necessary if Zabel's suggestion were taken seriously.

Rubinstein intended the work as a joke, and would be rude to his genius not to laugh heartily. But comic music without text or action is apt to breed solemnity, surprise, exhaustion, in fact anything but laughter.

Nor is it likely that anyone would imagine the music to be a sketch of Don Quixote's career, unless he were told so before the attack of the orchestra.

It is enough to say that the music as music is often ingenious and original. The instrumentation is interesting, and at times extremely effective.

The hearer may speculate at will; he may find the Knight in the bombastic orchestral utterances; he may discover the sheep, for sheep always gambol in music to certain instruments, and they browse on empty fifths; and any passionate strain announces Dulcinea in whatever disguised form she meets the Knight.

PHILIP HALL.

The programme for the fifteenth Symphony concert was a trifle long, and it ended tamely at the very last; but it held a great amount of interesting matter, and of its five numbers four were absolute novelties and two were for a solo instrument. The symphony, according to Mr. Paur's usual and excellent disposition, had the first place, and was consequently heard to the best possible advantage in the freshness of the listening. Being a work of Brahms—the second, in D major,—it naturally needed the closest and clearest attention. Yet the scores of Brahms, so complicated and forbidding at first, not only clarify but also endear themselves by repetition. Not the audiences merely, but the players and conductors themselves, are constantly obtaining a better grasp upon his methods and his manners; and there are accordingly a better transference of his ideas and a larger sympathy with his purposes. This second symphony is full of beauties as well as fraught with strength, and the sweet charm of its adagio and the quaint trickery of its scherzo can hardly escape even those who cannot trace the fragments of the themes which pass in and out with changeful form and elusive modulation in the opening allegro or those who fail to follow the impetuous rush of the intermingled motives of the finale. Mr. Paur's clear head and firm hand are well suited to the exposition of Brahms, for his ten-210 dency to over elucidate or over-accent the minor phrases in Beethoven, is almost exactly what is needed to help the listener find the wandering sentences which are so nearly lost in the curious and busy counterpoint and full instrumentation of the modern master. The present reading was an excellent one and was thoroughly appreciated.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler followed with two new morceaux for violin, each short and in a single movement. The one was a romance of a generally reposeful and placid character, by Bruch, and the other a Concert Piece by Saint-Saens, fantastic almost to grotesqueness and brilliantly gay, but without levity. Each in its way showed its author's knowledge of the instrument for which he was writing, both in the adaptation of its tone colors to the genre of his composition and in the choice of the technical display and difficulty appointed for the development and embellishment of his themes. At the place indicated for it in the latter piece Mr. Loeffler introduced a long cadenza of his own, quite in keeping with the principal theme and bristling with terrible but not repellent tests of technique. Mr. Loeffler's playing was altogether admirable—delightful in its smoothness and equality of tone, exact in intonation, elegant in phrasing, facile in the delivery of all the perplexities and audacities of the technical execution, sweet and sincere in sentiment. He was very spontaneously and very liberally applauded.

Next came "A Northern Campaign," described as an overture to a tragedy, and credited to Emil Hartmann, a native and resident of Copenhagen, now retired from public life, although less than sixty years of age and devoting himself to composition. This is a brief, but rather impressive work—impressive, rather by its dignified, coherent treatment and its atmosphere, than by any notable originality of melodic form or development, although it has touches of distinct individuality and felicity. It begins with the gloomy gravity of an impassive northern climate and temperament, and then passes,—through a trumpet figure which often reappears later on,—to its main matter in an energetic and excited allegro, which must be accepted as suggesting the outward pressure of military force, with conflict, clangor, exhilaration and courage against and over obstacles. Brilliance is imparted by the flights of harp chords and mystery is added in the occasional gloomy rattle of the tam-tam. This part of the work is developed with discreet reserve in extent as well as in volume, and a brief return to the theme and spirit of the introduction brings a quiet close.

The Tchaikowsky symphonic poem which had been promised was not forthcoming; but in place of it there was a "Humoresque" about Don Quixote, by Rubinstein. This purports to display symbolically a few of the characteristic episodes in the career of the notable knight of La Mancha. The sequence of these stands about as follows: The inflammation of his imagination by tales of chivalry and his resolve to set off on a conquering career all "plated in habiliments of war," to do doughty deeds and to win his Dulcinea's favor; his departure on his lumbering steed; his discovery and dispersal of the flock of sheep; his impassioned suit to the village women and their fear of him; his rescue from their escort of the criminals, who in recompense fall upon him and beat him; his lamentations over his bruises and because of the ingratitude and blindness of the world; his return home and his death among his sympathizing relatives and friends. There is a plenty of clever writing in this attempt at musical comedy and some of the minor episodes are really picturesque, particularly the pastoral incidents, the notions of martial pomp and valor and the ponderous onslaughts of knight and charger. But when all is said and done, one cannot set the piece down as very amusing, while it is not at all adapted for the end of a long programme because it dies away into nothingness after a lot of dolorous exclamations and melancholy phrases.

The playing all through the concert was fine, and even the drummer rarely expanded into excess.

Next Saturday's programme names nothing new: Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for strings, Haydn's second symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Mr. Max Heinrich will sing twice.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 24, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|------------|--|
| HANDEL. | CONCERTO GROSSO, No. 10, in D minor.
I. Ouverture: Lento.—Allegro.
II. Air: Lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Allegro.
V. Allegro moderato. |
| HANDEL. | AIR, "Honour and arms," from "Samson," Act II., Scene 4. |
| HAYDN. | SYMPHONY in D major, (Breitkopf & Härtel Ed. No. 2).
I. Adagio.—Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto: Allegro.—Trio.
IV. Allegro spiritoso. |
| MOZART. | ARIA, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," Act I., Scene 3. |
| BEETHOVEN. | OVERTURE to "Egmont," in F minor, op. 84. |

Soloist:

MR. MAX HEINRICH.

212

Having put so many novelties on his fifteenth programme, Mr. Paur evidently thought that he had best give both audience and orchestra a little rest when he came to the sixteenth. Consequently the orchestral music heard last night was all familiar—Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for strings; Haydn's second symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Nor did Mr. Max Heinrich, who appeared as the soloist, add anything of fresh interest in his selections; for he calmly chose for his first number that stand-by of country bass singers for a century past and that delight of musical conventions ever since they were invented—"Honor and Arms," from Handel's "Samson." His other song was not quite so worn-out, although pretty nearly entitled to be relegated to the category of the hackneyed—Osmin's air from Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio," beginning in the original text with the words, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen."

The interest of the concert then depended chiefly on the performance, only the Beethoven having the true assurance of perennial life and authority in its pathos and passion. The orchestral work was generally excellent, and Mr. Paur was delightfully clear in his announcement and pursuit of the themes and secondary figures in the concerto. The little solo passages therein were charmingly put in, and one could only note unfavorably an occasional disposition on the part of some players to force the pace, which caused a little transitory clouding of the texture. The symphony was sweetly and kindly done,—usually with respect to its author's simplicity of style, but with some unnecessary and (to our thinking) incongruous relaxations of tempo and sophistications of expression, particularly in the opening allegro. The trio of the minuet was admirably marked, and so were the odd accents and rustic beat of the landler-like theme of the finale. The great overture was dramatically read, and its great chords had their due snap and thrill; of course the drummer, thereto incited by Mr. Paur, was often too much in evidence and displaced the symmetry of the stronger passages.

Mr. Heinrich was by no means at his best in "Honor and Arms," which we have often heard sung better. It needs a voice of solid, even and true bass quality, which his is not, and the singer's execution should be equal to delivering the long roulades, especially on the word "glory," without slackening the time as he did. The Mozart scene, with its petulant determination, suited him far better, and he tossed it off with vigor, animation and point.

Next Saturday's programme is thus appointed: From Berlioz the "Fantastic" Symphony, from Liszt, the "Orpheus" symphonic poem; from Glinka, the "Komarins kaja," and the overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," which latter is new.

213

Perhaps now that it has been authoritatively stated that Mr. Paur's contract is for five years, extensible to ten, the New York Musical Courier will leave off its mean little lying flings about his tenure of office. And by the way, it is more than blotted that the inspiration for them has been found in jealous letters emanating from the family of his predecessor.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

MUSIC.

The Sixteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Handel
Air, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson".....Handel
Symphony in D major, B. and H. No. 2.....Haydn
Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

Were the men of the last century another race, such as might inhabit another planet, that they spoke in music with such confidence and such serenity? Their lives were often vexed and troubled; they knew passion and poverty; they were not averse to the sweet sex, and poor Haydn's name is in the long catalogue that, knowing Xantippe, began with Socrates and will not end with your estimable friend Brown. They hung on prince's favors; nor were the times always of piping peace. But their music has not the vague restlessness of this tired and dying century; it is not tentative; its melancholy is seldom hopeless; its gaiety is not haunted with the thought of death; the music might have come down to us from the childhood of the world. Handel, Mozart, Haydn knew full well the art of art, which is simplicity. Furthermore, they were masters of their trade.

Was not such music, finely played under Mr. Paur's direction, a delight? Yes, and no. However much the man of this generation may honor and love the music of the past and envy the musical spirit and knowledge of the makers, the very serenity and the unerring skill become irksome in a concert almost wholly devoted to such music, and he finds himself longing for the musical atmosphere that is surcharged with dissonances which fret his nerves and irritate. The poetice has done its work; he would fain apply a blister. He would like to listen to wails and groans, threats and imprecations, blatant denials and even blasphemy itself, with a terminating passages of sensuous joy and mystic happiness, or the promise of happiness. For such music is more in keeping with the spirit of this age. The modern hearer is a part of this age; nor can he escape from it.

Mr. Max Heinrich sang Osmin's air with dramatic intelligence and made thereby a marked effect. He was not as successful in the familiar air by Handel, although he sang it with spirit. When did the custom of singing this air in a broken, spasmodic, jerky manner first come upon the stage? For surely in Handel's day the roulades were sung smoothly and with great volubility, as any other roulade. The modern practice is mistaken realism. And as for realism, it is not likely that Harapha, the giant of Philistia, could sing roulades at all.

PHILIP HALE.

Having put so many novelties on his fifteenth programme, Mr. Paur evidently thought that he had best give both audience and orchestra a little rest when he came to the sixteenth. Consequently the orchestral music heard last night was all familiar—Handel's "Concerto Grosso," for strings; Haydn's second symphony, and Beethoven's "Egmont" overture. Nor did Mr. Max Heinrich, who appeared as the soloist, add anything of fresh interest in his selections; for he calmly chose for his first number that stand-by of country bass singers for a century past and that delight of musical conventions ever since they were invented—"Honor and Arms," from Handel's "Samson." His other song was not quite so worn-out, although pretty nearly entitled to be relegated to the category of the hackneyed—Osmin's air from Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio," beginning in the original text with the words, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen."

The interest of the concert then depended chiefly on the performance, only the Beethoven having the true assurance of perennial life and authority in its pathos and passion. The orchestral work was generally excellent, and Mr. Paur was delightfully clear in his announcement and pursuit of the themes and secondary figures in the concerto. The little solo passages therein were charmingly put in, and one could only note unfavorably an occasional disposition on the part of some players to force the pace, which caused a little transitory clouding of the texture. The symphony was sweetly and kindly done,—usually with respect to its author's simplicity of style, but with some unnecessary and (to our thinking) incongruous relaxations of tempo and sophistications of expression, particularly in the opening allegro. The trio of the minuet was admirably marked, and so were the odd accents and rustic beat of the landler-like theme of the finale. The great overture was dramatically read, and its great chords had their due snap and thrill; of course the drummer, thereto incited by Mr. Paur, was often too much in evidence and displaced the symmetry of the stronger passages.

Mr. Heinrich was by no means at his best in "Honor and Arms," which we have often heard sung better. It needs a voice of solid, even and true bass quality, which his is not, and the singer's execution should be equal to delivering the long roulades, especially on the word "glory," without slackening the time as he did. The Mozart scene, with its petulant determination, suited him far better, and he tossed it off with vigor, animation and point.

Next Saturday's programme is thus appointed: From Berlioz the "Fantastic" Symphony, from Liszt, the "Orpheus" symphonic poem; from Gluck, the "Komarins kaja," and the overture to "Russian and Ludmilla," which latter is new.

Perhaps now that it has been authoritatively stated that Mr. Paur's contract is for five years, extensible to ten, the New York Musical Courier will leave off its mean little lying flings about his tenure of office. And by the way, it is more than hinted that the inspiration for them has been found in jealous letters emanating from the family of his predecessor.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

MUSIC.

The Sixteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Handel
Air, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson".....Handel
Symphony in D major, B. and H. No. 2.....Haydn
Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

Were the men of the last century another race, such as might inhabit another planet, that they spoke in music with such confidence and such serenity? Their lives were often vexed and troubled; they knew passion and poverty; they were not averse to the sweet sex, and poor Haydn's name is in the long catalogue that, knowing Xantippe, began with Socrates and will not end with your estimable friend Brown. They hung on prince's favors; nor were the times always of piping peace. But their music has not the vague restlessness of this tired and dying century; it is not tentative; its melancholy is seldom hopeless; its gaiety is not haunted with the thought of death; the music might have come down to us from the childhood of the world. Handel, Mozart, Haydn knew full well the art of art, which is simplicity. Furthermore, they were masters of their trade.

Was not such music, finely played under Mr. Paur's direction, a delight? Yes, and no. However much the man of this generation may honor and love the music of the past and envy the musical spirit and knowledge of the makers, the very serenity and the unerring skill become irksome in a concert almost wholly devoted to such music, and he finds himself longing for the musical atmosphere that is surcharged with dissonances which fret his nerves and irritate. The poultice has done its work; he would fain apply a blister. He would like to listen to waifs and greaves, threats and imprecations, blatant blasphemy and even blasphemy itself, with a terminating passage of sensuous joy and mystic happiness, or the promise of happiness. For such music is more in keeping with the spirit of this age. The modern hearer is a part of this age; nor can he escape from it.

Mr. Max Heinrich sang Osmin's air with dramatic intelligence and made thereby a marked effect. He was not as successful in the familiar air by Handel, although he sang it with spirit. When did the custom of singing this air in a broken, spasmodic, jerky manner first come upon the stage? For surely in Handel's day the roulades were sung smoothly and with great volubility, as any other roulade. The modern practice is mistaken realism. And as for realism, it is not likely that Harapha, the giant of Phinistia, could sing roulades at all.

PHILIP HALL.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Echoes From the Sixteenth Symphony --- People's Concert Today---Preludes.

Mr Paur offered a grand program at last week's symphony, selections from Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven forming the musical pabulum. The performance was one of the best given by the orchestra this season, and the adherents to the strictly classic in program making probably were satisfied, or should have been. Mr Max Heinrich appeared as soloist and sang arias from Handel's "Samson," and Mozart's "Elopement from the Seraglio."

When an artist is equally successful in singing such contrasting styles of compositions he must be possessed of unusual dramatic as well as musical abilities, and Mr Heinrich's certainly was successful. The heroic, declamatory delivery of Samson's aria was thoroughly in keeping with the character and the long sustained runs on the vowels, a vocal exercise one might call it, were clear, rich, resonant and sweet.

The humor of the Mozart number was capably illustrated and "Your cunning, your wiles, your pranks," etc, was sung in the vein of a true comedian. The singer appeared to enjoy his work as much as did the audience and although a hypercritical concert devotee might object to dramatic action in a concert number, no doubt Mr Heinrich added much to the general enjoyment by his slight suggestions of the operatic stage. He was enthusiastically applauded for his fine work.

Handel's concerto for string instruments began the program. The special features of the delightful interpretation were the odd fugue for three instruments, the work of the first and second violins in the fourth movement, and the closing allegro in which the solo and accompanying instruments play the same parts.

Haydn's symphony in D major was rendered grandly, the strong passages in adagio being notably broad and sonorous. The slow and graceful rondo and the minuet, stately and melodious, were played with exquisite delicacy and tone color. The fantasia in the finale was also delightfully given.

Beethoven's dramatic overture to "Egmont," which closed the concert, showed but few marked changes from the traditional readings, and was artistically and conservatively performed.

The program for this week's rehearsal and concert will be as follows: Berlioz, "Fantastic Symphony;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Orpheus;" Glinka, "Komarinskaja," and overture to "Russian and Ludmilla."

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was chronological in order, beginning with Handel's Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D-minor, and followed by the air, "Honor and Arms," from the same composer's "Samson." Then came Haydn's Symphony, in D (B. & H. No. 2), which was succeeded, in turn, by the air, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from Mozart's "Escape from the Seraglio," the whole concluding with Beethoven's "Egmont," overture. It was an interesting and well-arranged programme, and its performance was characterized throughout, by a fine feeling, on the part of Mr. Paur, for the distinctive individualities of the various composers. The Handel Concerto, consisting of five movements, is not over-long, and is less monotonous than such works generally are. The slow movement, is very beautiful, and the three succeeding allegros are delightfully fresh and vivacious, the closing one having a fascinating piquancy. The Haydn Symphony was read in a masterly manner throughout, and was beautifully played, the interpretation being in the true Haydn vein, frank and free from affectation. The "Egmont" overture received a noble reading, and the closing portion was given with splendid fire, the final climax being led up to magnificently. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist, and his appearance was the signal for a cordial welcome. He sang the Handel air broadly and dramatically and in a thoroughly artistic spirit, winning a hearty recognition of his performance in the warm applause and the two recalls that rewarded it. His interpretation of the Mozart selection was an admirable example of chaste buffo singing, and was a musicianly effort generally, notably in its thorough sympathy with the character of the air. For this, Mr. Heinrich was also vigorously applauded, and twice recalled. The programme for the next concert is as follows: "Symphony Fantastique," Berlioz; Symphonic poem, "Orpheus," Liszt; "Komarinskaja," a fantasia for orchestra, Glinka; and overture, "Russian and Ludmilla," Glinka. There will be no soloist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

The concert of Saturday presented a rather conservative programme, with nothing of the modern school to contrast with the classical numbers of Handel, Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven. Next Saturday the moderns will have their innings, and Liszt and Berlioz will rule.

One can cordially coincide with the readings of the old masters which Mr. Paur gave at this concert; Handel was not made prosy nor Haydn childishly simple. The Concerto Grosso began with an overture in the old form established by Lulli, having two movements of contrasted style, the first simple and slow, the second rapid and contrapuntally developed. Through this work and in the Haydn symphony which came later on the programme, the conductor showed plainly that he understood the moderate and conservative manner in which the terms of Tempo were used in the classical epoch. The allegro movements were made allegro giusto, the slow ones were not given in the extreme adagio which is in vogue at present. The strings played with fine shading and absolute clearness in the concerto; this department of our orchestra is equal to any organization of its kind in the world and is now regaining something of that precision which was blurred for a season. Mr. Max Heinrich was the soloist of the concert and sang like the cultured musician that he is; there no mellow bass voices in existence, but one could never hear a clearer, better phrased performance than was given of Handel's "Honor and Arms." After all, one may set against the old Italian saying that three things are necessary to make a singer,—"first, voice, second, voice, and third, voice," the fact that one would rather hear a great art at on a lesser instrument than a weak artist on a better one. The timbre of the voice in "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen" from Mozart's "Entfuehrung" was not that of an Edouard de Reszke, but the number was effective in a superlative degree. Many recalls were given to Mr. Heinrich, and the enthusiasm was justified.

The Haydn symphony (Breitkopf & Haertel ed. No. 2, D major) was something to praise unstintedly. There was sufficient caprice in the Minuet, there was sturdiness and vigor in the finale with its Drone bass, there was fiery treatment in the Allegro. Such a performance must have been a lesson to those who find only formality and periwigs in the early symphonies. The ensemble was excellent throughout and the work received appreciative applause.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture gave a dramatic tinge to the concert without being formless or vague, or indulging in modern musical hysterics. Great brilliancy characterized the performance. The work is one that Beethoven wrote with enthusiasm, for he was the red republican among composers. Liberty was his religion, and this was the keynote of the heroic symphony, the finale of the ninth symphony and the "Egmont" overture. There had been no Motley to show that Egmont was not a great hero, there had been no calm abolition of Claerchen and the love episode, so that Goethe's picture stood for Love and Heroism, and the overture reflected that picture. Right fiercely did the piccolo and flute give the representation of the uprising of the Dutch people, and those wonderful whip-snap phrases of the final cadences were forcible enough (they are probably the most characteristic notes ever written for the piccolo), while the entire second portion of the work was massive and energetic as heart could wish. A noble ending of a most worthy concert. LOUIS C. ELSON.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the sixteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was—

Handel: Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor.
Handel: Air, "Honor and arms," from "Samson," Act II, scene 4.
Haydn: Symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Haertel edition, No. 2).
Mozart: Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail," act I, scene 3.
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," in F minor, op. 84.
Mr. Max Heinrich was the singer.

Mr. Paur could hardly have selected five pieces that, considered in the lump, would make up a programme in more violent contrast with that of the preceding concert. It was just such a programme as would suit those eminently conservative gentlemen who hold that the development of music stopped in the first quarter of the century and that all since then has been as so much over-ripening, not to say rotteness. Two numbers were unfamiliar to nine-tenths of the hearers—the Handel concerto and the Mozart aria—but each was so entirely in the style of its author that one might easily persuade himself into the belief that he had heard it hundreds of times. The series of movements by Handel, for instance, starts off with a vivid reminder of the opening measures of the overture to "The Messiah," while the aria from Mozart's early opera sounds for all the world as if it were a bit from Figaro's part in that wonderful opera built on the story of the wedding of Beaumarchais's incomparable valet-de-chambre. On the whole the concert may be characterized as reposeful, with no intention to use the term as a euphemism for soporific. Nevertheless, but for the splendid work of the orchestra, or rather its string contingents, the concerto might have set some heads to nodding—and no wonder, with four succeeding movements in one key, and that a minor, even if there is a major for the close.

Mr. Heinrich sang with care and judgment, but was not always happy in his execution of the Handel roulades. The buffo aria was better fitted to the singer's voice and manner. The audience testified to a satisfaction with his efforts by hearty recalls.

This is the programme for next Friday afternoon and Saturday night: Berlioz, "Fantastic Symphony;" Liszt, symphonic poem, "Orpheus;" Glinka, "Komarinskaja" and overture to "Russian and Ludmilla."

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A singularly monotonous programme excellently performed states concisely the facts regarding the 16th of the season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given under Emil Paur's direction, at Music Hall last evening. Mr. Max Heinrich, baritone, was the soloist, and the selections were: Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 10, in D minor; Handel's aria, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson," act 2, scene 4; Haydn's Symphony in D major (Breitkopf & Bartel, No. 2); Mozart's aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail," act 1, scene 3, and Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," in F minor, Op. 84.

All compositions demand a contrast to be fully enjoyed, when included in a concert programme, and the striking similarity in style in these several numbers made the concert less interesting than many others of the season.

The singing of Mr. Heinrich was even more enjoyable than usual, under the circumstances, and he has seldom gained a greater vocal triumph than on this occasion. The great Handel aria was delivered in magnificent style, the singer's phrasing of the number showing a consummate mastery of the composer's style, and his voice responded to the demands of the aria with telling effect. His grand vocal work aroused the enthusiasm of the audience so that repeated recalls rewarded the singer. The Beethoven aria was an equally successful effort, and its character was fully realized in the interpretation given it by Mr. Heinrich.

Handel's concerta displayed the work of the string players of the band to excellent advantage, and the merits of this section of the orchestra have not been more apparent in any of the season's concerts. Mr. Paur's reading of the Haydn symphony was full of interesting characteristics, and the men of the orchestra gave their best work in bringing out his ideas of the several movements. A most impressive performance of the great "Egmont" overture ended the programme in a way to leave a most favorable impression of the evening's work despite the character and make-up of the programme. Next Saturday selections are Berlioz' symphony fantastique; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus"; Glinka's Komarinskaja, a fantasia for orchestra on two Russian folk songs, and Glinka's overture from the opera "Russlan et Ludmilla."

MUSIC.

The Sixteenth Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

The program of the Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Concerto Grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Handel
Air, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson".....Handel
Symphony in D major, B. and H. No. 2.....Haydn
Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

Were the men of the last century another race, such as might inhabit another planet, that they spoke in music with such confidence and such serenity? Their lives were often vexed and troubled; they knew passion and poverty; they were not averse to the sweet sex, and poor Haydn's name is in the long catalogue that, knowing Xantippe, began with Socrates and will not end with your estimable friend Brown. They hung on prince's favors; nor were the times always of piping peace. But their music has not the vague restlessness of this tired and dying century; it is not tentative; its melancholy is seldom hopeless; its gaiety is not haunted with the thought of death; the music might have come down to us from the childhood of the world. Handel, Mozart, Haydn knew full well the art of art, which is simplicity. Furthermore, they were masters of their trade.

Was not such music, finely played under Mr. Paur's direction, a delight? Yes, and no. However much the man of this generation may honor and love the music of the past and envy the musical spirit and knowledge of the makers, the very serenity and the unerring skill become irksome in a concert almost wholly devoted to such music, and he finds himself longing for the musical atmosphere that is surcharged with dissonances which fret his nerves and irritate. The poultice has done its work; he would fain apply a blister. He would like to listen to wails and groans, threats and imprecations, blatant defiance and even blasphemy itself, with alternating passages of sensuous joy and mystic happiness, or the promise of happiness. For such music is more in keeping with the spirit of this age. The modern hearer is a part of this age; nor can he escape from it.

Mr. Max Heinrich sang Osmin's air with dramatic intelligence and made thereby a marked effect. He was not as successful in the familiar air by Handel, although he sang it with spirit. When did the custom of singing this air in a broken, spasmodic, jerky manner first come upon the stage? For sure in Handel's day the roudades were sung smoothly and with great volubility, as any other roudade. The modern practice in mistaken realism. And as for realism, it is not likely that Harapha, the giant of Philistia, could sing roudades at all.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON

MR.

SATURDAY

BERLIOZ.

LISZT.

GLINKA.

GLINKA.

The program of the sixteenth concert of the Symphony Orchestra given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Concerto grosso, No. 10, in D minor.....Händel
Air, "Honor and Arms," from "Samson".....Händel
Symphony in D major, No. 2.....Haydn
Aria, "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail".....Mozart
Overture to "Egmont".....Beethoven

The makers of music in the eighteenth century were not free from the insect vexations, the burdens of everyday life. They often hung on prince's favors; nor were the times always those of piping peace. They knew the chills and the sweats of passion. Poor Haydn's name is in the long catalogue of men that knew and know Xantippe, from Socrates to your neighbor Jones, or Brown, or Robinson. Haydn also knew the charms of Luigia Moreschi Polzelli, the mezzo-soprano; Mrs. Shaw divided with Mrs. Hodges the honor of being "the most beautiful woman he ever saw;" and we may read to-day the amorous words that told of the heart flutters of Mistress Schroeter, 6 James street, Buckingham Gate.

But the men of the last century spoke in music with a confidence and a serenity unknown to us. Their music has not the restlessness of the last years of this dying century. Their music is not tentative; its melancholy is seldom hopeless; its gaiety is not haunted by the thought and the shudder of death.

Was not, then, such music well played under Mr. Paur's direction a relief and a delight? Yes, and then again, No. The man of this generation may honor and love the music of the past and envy the spirit and the knowledge of the makers; but the very serenity and the unerring skill become irksome in a concert almost wholly devoted to such music, and the man longs for dissonances that fret the nerves, irritate and stab. He would fain hear groans and imprecations, threats, yea, blasphemy itself, with alternating passages of sensuous joy and mystic happiness, or vague hints at happiness. The modern hearer is a part of this age; nor can he escape from it.

Mr. Max Heinrich sang "Osmin's" air with dramatic intelligence, and made thereby a marked effect. I did not care for his version of "Honor and Arms." He sang it with over accentuation in the roudades, often spasmodically and without any thought of a possible legato. I admit that such a performance of this air is the fashion to-day. But surely in Händel's time the roudades were sung smoothly, nor was there any thought of mistaken realism. As for the realism, it is not probable that Harapha, the Philistine giant, sang roudades at all.

* * *

The program of the Symphony Concert this week will be as follows:

Symphony Fantastique.....Berlioz
Symphonic poem, "Orpheus".....Liszt
"Kamarinskaja".....Glinka
Overture from the opera, "Russlan et Ludmilla".....Glinka
(First time.)

PHILIP HALE.

218

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 3, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ.

SYMPHONIE FANTASTIQUE in C major, op. 14A.

I. RÊVERIES—PASSIONS: Largo.—Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.

II. UN BAL: Valse, Allegro non troppo.

III. SCÈNE AUX CHAMPS: Adagio.

IV. MARCHÉ AU SUPPLICE: Allegretto non troppo.

V. SONGE D'UNE NUIT DU SABBAT: Larghetto.—Allegro.

LISZT.

SYMPHONIC POEM, No. 4. "Orpheus."

GLINKA.

KOMARINSKAJA, FANTASIA on two Russian Folk-Songs.

GLINKA.

OVERTURE to "Ruslan et Ludmilla," in D major.
(First time.)

The Piano is a Steinway.

TO THE SYMPHONY.

MUSICAL BOSTON TURNS AGAIN

As a Pleasing Interval in the Operatic Season

—A Fine Programme Finely Rendered—

Mme. Melba's Great Success as "Lucia di Lammermoor"—Her Enthusiastic Reception

"On revient toujours, à ses premiers amours." Spite of the operatic banquet, the symphonic table was thronged as usual on Saturday, and it was a pleasant change to turn from the vocal to the instrumental school, as it was a pleasant thought to remember that while the opera is an exotic, the Symphony Orchestra at least, is indigenous to Boston soil.

Yet there was something left to be desired in the present concert. The following of Berlioz's fantastic symphony with Liszt's "Orpheus" (which might better have been called "Morpheus") was a strong instance of unfitness of juxtaposition, and made as marked an anti-climax as was ever heard.

The Symphonie Fantastique was never played more clearly, and seldom less satisfactorily, in its first two movements, than on this occasion. The vagueness of the first movement and the elasticity of the second were but slightly indicated, and the extreme exactitude with which the love-theme was played in this portion of the composition would have been commendable if love were a mathematical problem. But in the third movement matters changed for the better; the beautiful dialogue between the English horn and the oboe was excellently rendered, while the clarinette theme against the striking pizzicato accompaniment was also a noble feature of the performance. For once the kettledrums were worthy of praise: Berlioz has given a wonderful touch here, when the shepherd calls to his love and is answered by a dreadful silence, followed by a thunder peal that tells plainly enough of the fate of the shepherdess. The English horn was especially effective in the lonely phrases which closed the movement.

The march to execution was splendidly read and superbly played. In some of the ancient Ionian cities human victims were led to execution by a procession headed by flute players, and it is recorded that the effect of the music (called the "Nome of Kradias") was peculiarly depressing. Such a feeling of depression has Berlioz produced in this movement by his mutterings of the bassoons. Only one other bassoon passage rivals this in strange and uncanny tone-color,—the theme (in the dull middle register of the instrument) with which Meyerbeer brings the nuns from their graves, in "Robert le Diable." But these bassoons do not head the procession as in Ionia; Berlioz has pictured by their agency the footsteps of the crowd pressing along with the tumbril to the place of execution. The composer probably never read Dickens, yet if one were to choose a heading for this morbid bassoon theme it would certainly come from "The Tale of Two Cities," and would read—"Headlong, mad, and dangerous footsteps to force their way into anybody's life, footsteps not easily made clean again if once stained red." But this is not the only weird point which the Edgar Allan Poe of music has introduced in this fearful march, for the pizzicato chords upon the contrabasses are a most impressive touch and one which was entirely new at the time it was written. Probably the most dramatic touch in the work, or possibly in the whole domain of programme-music, is the appearance of the love-theme on flute and clarinette, unaccompanied, which pictures the murderer at the supreme moment; before this thought is completed the axe falls, and, at least to the reviewer, the few remaining measures portray a quivering corpse.

But Berlioz revelled chiefly in his finales, and never enjoyed himself so well as when he ended with an orgie of fiends, human or otherwise. "Faust," "Childe Harold," and this symphony, all end with this demoniacal touch. Every detail of the finale was well attended to. The bells would have been improved by the addition of a soft stroke of Tamtam, but from the entrance of the love-theme, now dragged in the mire of mockery and derision, the effect was most exciting. Berlioz found even the impish piccolo insufficient for his purpose in this picture, and adopted the most unusual device of introducing an E flat clarinette to the orchestra. The first phrases of this instrument were rather too mellow, as if they were blown on a B flat clarinette, but the later measures were shrieking enough. From the third movement to the end of the symphony was a great success.

Liszt's "Orpheus" needs no long description. The harp preluding which appropriately began the work was finely done, and there was no fault to be found with the execution, but the composition seemed to have very little to say, after the power of Berlioz's symphony.

The "Kamarinskaia" (a Russian song-dance for men alone) by Glinka was an interesting number. It had a certain monotony of repetition which is not a fault in the folk-dance. There is an excellent vocal setting of a similar subject, by the nervous little Laurent de Rillé of Paris, which deserves to cross the water some day.

Glinka followed Glinka in this oddly assorted programme, and the overture to "Russian and Ludmilla" brought the concert to a close. This was rollicking and hearty music, and was in the good, classical form which Mozart established for the overture, from which most modern composers have strayed. It was finely performed.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

With the devil at one end of the town and duty at the other the musical public of Boston had a severe test of its loyalty to its pet home institution last evening.

It is gratifying to say, however, that despite the blandishments of even such a magnificent representative of his satanic majesty as Edouard de Reszke duty prevailed, and Music Hall was as densely filled with the symphony pat-tone as usual. A glance at the programme justifies a strong suspicion that Mr. Emil Paur appreciated the situation, and prepared as strong a counter attraction as was possible by the use of all the modern orchestral forces placed at his command.

222

He began his programme with the fantastic symphony by Berlioz, and he gave such a performance of this work as has seldom, if ever, been heard here before. The demands of the composer were very nearly met, and little short of a hundred musicians were called together for the occasion. Mr. Paur's reading of this most remarkable composition was one that would have delighted even its composer, for it is difficult to imagine a better interpretation of its several fascinating movements. The reveries with which the symphony opens were played in a delightful fashion, and all the varying emotions through which the sleeper is supposed to pass were given with exquisite effect. The men of the band were entirely under the control of the conductor's baton, and the effects of the many charming combinations of instruments were wonderfully pleasing. In the second movement the love valse was performed with a swing and rhythm that was indicative of a perfect mastery of this class of compositions by the conductor, and the tone picture of the movement was realized in the happiest fashion. The scene in the fields following was brought out in fine contrast with the preceding movement, and the great march to the scaffold was played with stupendous effect. In the final movement, in which the revels of the Walpurgis night are pictured, the marvellous work of the composer was realized in the fullest degree, and if anything more fascinating in the way of tone pictures is to be experienced in the lower regions of the future, that place will have a strong attraction for those who listened to last night's performance of this symphony. The audience was carried from one state of excitement to another, and left in a condition of semi-delirium as the final movement was ended.

Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus" was the next composition and the poetical ideas which are so beautifully expressed in it were made distinctly prominent throughout its reading by Mr. Paur. The odd "Komarinskaja" by Glinka was then given a fine performance, and the programme was ended with the same composer's overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla," which had its first performance here on this occasion. A more tuneful and brilliant ending to this decidedly remarkable programme could hardly have been chosen, and it left the audience entirely satisfied with having followed the general rule and attended to the symphony like good Boston citizens as they were.

Next Saturday night's programme has Beethoven's fourth symphony, "The Hebrides" and "Marriage of Figaro" overtures and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale as its number.

Orchestral Numbers Make Up the Symphony Program — Union Hall and Graham's Sunday Entertainments—Notes.

Hector Berlioz' fantastic symphony in C major; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and Glinka's Russian dance and overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla," the latter for the first time here, was the program for the 17th symphony rehearsal and concert last week. The attendance was not up to the usual standard, probably on account of the great musical attractions elsewhere. Berlioz' composition, founded on incidents in his own life, tells the story of a young composer who, being unsuccessful in his love affairs, attempts to kill himself with a narcotic, which only throws him into a slumber, in which strange visions appear to him.

The magnificent precision and harmony in execution of the orchestra was splendidly illustrated in the fantastic work. The principal, and in reality the only theme in the first movement, a melody called by the composer, "The Fixed Idea," was charmingly played in unison by the violins and flutes, the two contingents blending perfectly. In the waltz movements of the second part the sensuous swing and rhythm of the dance music was perfectly preserved, the harp part adding greatly to the beautiful waltz melody.

The contrast in the third tone picture, which is distinctly pastoral, is marked, but built upon the traditional rural plan. Here Berlioz introduces extra kettle drums with telling effect, and the simulations of a thunder storm are very striking. In this movement all the rural "accessories" have a thematic significance, and the melodic theme of love, introduced with the first notes of the opening allegro, are skillfully interwoven at oft-occurring intervals.

The peculiarities in the orchestration were carefully observed by Mr. Paur, who retained throughout a poetic interpretation which was not obscured by the realisms conceived by the composer. "The March to the Scaffold" was given with grand sonorosity and breadth of tone color, the gruesome themes by the bassoons being notably solemn and suggestive of the monks' prayers for a prisoner. The brasses lagged a little in some of the measures, but the number as a whole was finely played. Diabolism reigned in the closing movement as the composer scores it, and the manner in which the conductor held his forces together was very commendable for the temptation to a chaotic hurly-burly here is very great.

The symphony poem by Liszt was gracefully interpreted. The Russian songs and dances by Glinka is one of those compositions characteristic with so many writers educated in the land of the czar, and aside from its odd reiteration of a theme by the violins, played about 100 times, calls for no special commendation.

The overture by the same composer, given for the first time here, is a well-conceived and admirably orchestrated composition. It is brilliant, and abounds in strong passage work for the violins which is exceedingly difficult. The strings accomplished their work magnificently with the themes in the fantasia, their playing being clear and brilliant, and the brass contingent redeemed itself by the excellence of its harmony and tempo in the concluding coda.

The program for the rehearsal and concert this week will be the overture from "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's symphony No. 4, Mendelssohn's overture, "Hebrides," and a Schumann overture, scherzo and finale.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

(See Page Six.)

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique in C major, Opus 14 a.
Liszt: Symphonie Poem No. 4, "Orpheus."
Glinka: Komarinskaja.
Glinka: Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla," in D major.

(First time.)

It is not uninteresting to compare this programme with those of the preceding and next following concerts, for each one of the three seems to form a part of a definite scheme. The sixteenth programme was:

Handel: Concerto Grosso No. 10, in D minor.
Handel: Aria, "Honor and arms," from "Samson."
Haydn: Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2).
Mozart: Aria, "Solche hergelant'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail."
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," in F minor, opus 84.

The eighteenth programme is to be:
Mozart: Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," in D major.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 80.
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Hebriden," in B minor, opus 26.
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, opus 52.

Here we have three successive programmes, each one of which illustrates the development of a particular tendency—Richtung, as the Germans have it—in the art of music. The sixteenth begins with Handel, and then passes on through Haydn (the father of the symphony) and Mozart to Beethoven in his second manner. The seventeenth illustrates in a way the Liszt-Berlioz idea in composition, the programme-symphony and the symphonic poem, and then gives two characteristic examples of the Russian school, as it was specifically influenced by Berlioz. And it may be noted here that the Russian school of composition, in so far as it shows the effect of any foreign influence, owed more to Berlioz than to any other un-Russian composer until it began, through Tchaikowsky, to feel the very different influence of Schumann. Thus Glinka belongs with Berlioz quite as much, if in a somewhat different way, as Liszt does. The eighteenth programme illustrates what was once known as the "modern romantic" direction in German music. It shows Mendelssohn and Schumann as the outgrowth of Mozart (the opera composer, and hence the romanticist) and Beethoven. The scheme would have been more complete had Schubert and Weber been included in it; but, even as it is, it has a certain unmistakable definiteness of purpose.

The performance on Saturday evening of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony was one of the finest we have yet heard; it was played with all the fire, delicacy, and nice attention to detail that Berlioz's writing demands. For once, we have had the symphony given exactly according to the original score; even the bells in the last movement were there.

Liszt's "Orpheus" was also capitally played; Glinka's humorous "Komarinskaja," with its hundred and three consecutive measures of the same thing over and over again, was played with great precision and spirit and evidently much enjoyed by the audience. The audience, by the way, had shown, in the Fantastic Symphony, a peculiar preference, probably unique in the annals of concert-giving; it seemed to care little for either the "Scene in the Fields" or the "March to the Scaffold" (usually the most applauded movements), but fairly went into raptures over the "Walpurgis-Night's Dream!" Explain this who can.

Glinka's overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla" is a brilliant work, on the border-line between the serious and the light opera overture. It was admirably played. The next programme has already been given, and need not be repeated here.

If Mr. Paur's sixteenth programme was all conservative, his seventeenth, played last night, was thoroughly modern, and gave the best of chances for seeing how this conductor—charged at first with being a man of wood and a pedant—could yield to the influences of Berlioz, Liszt and Glinka, and play them as if his soul were in the rendering. It is safe to declare that such a superb presentation of the "Fantastic" symphony is rarely heard anywhere, and has never been heard in Boston. The orchestra was magnified, according to Berlioz's wishes, if not to his full demands. There were the four trumpets, the four bassoons, the squeaking rough little clarinets, the four kettle drums, the opheleide, the harp, the bells of the chime, the gong and all the rest. And this little army Mr. Paur led with enthusiasm and energy to triumph, the extra men following his lead with the readiness of his elder troops. As orchestral virtuosity, the performance was superb; and as romance, legend, vision and passion in music it was almost wonderful. Master of moods no less than of the mysteries of orchestration, Berlioz would surely have applauded this reading, with its tender grace, its devotion, its terrors, its awe and its diabolism and effrontery. The symphony, which is more than an hour long, played with the intensity which the men threw into their work, would have almost made a concert of itself; but Mr. Paur had three numbers to append. These were, the generally placid and pleasant "Orpheus" idyl of Liszt, the merry, buoyant "Komarinskaja" of Glinka and the same author's overture to his "Ruslan and Ludmilla," a brief but tremendously animated composition, which was played (especially by the violins) with a dash and a brilliancy such as have not been heard before since Mr. Gericke's palmy time. Through all the programme the men played with remarkable spirit, vigor and enjoyment, to which the audience responded quickly and warmly.

For next Saturday this is the array:—Beethoven's fourth symphony and two overtures—Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Mendelssohn's "Hebrides," followed by the Overture, Scherzo and Finale of Schumann.

Corner

rons as usual.

A glance at the programme justifies a strong suspicion that Mr. Emil Paur appreciated the situation, and prepared as strong a counter attraction as was possible by the use of all the modern orchestral forces placed at his command.

He began his programme with the fantastic symphony by Berlioz, and he gave such a performance of this work as has seldom, if ever, been heard here before. The demands of the composer were very nearly met, and little short of a hundred musicians were called together for the occasion. Mr. Paur's reading of this most remarkable composition was one that would have delighted even its composer, for it is difficult to imagine a better interpretation of its several fascinating movements. The reveries with which the symphony opens were played in a delightful fashion, and all the varying emotions through which the sleeper is supposed to pass were given with exquisite effect. The men of the band were entirely under the control of the conductor's baton, and the effects of the many charming combinations of instruments were wonderfully pleasing. In the second movement the love valse was performed with a swing and rhythm that was indicative of a perfect mastery of this class of compositions by the conductor, and the tone picture of the movement was realized in the happiest fashion. The scene in the fields following was brought out in fine contrast with the preceding movement, and the great march to the scaffold was played with stupendous effect. In the final movement, in which the revels of the Walpurgis night are pictured, the marvellous work of the composer was realized in the fullest degree, and if anything more fascinating in the way of tone pictures is to be experienced in the lower regions of the future, that place will have a strong attraction for those who listened to last night's performance of this symphony. The audience was carried from one state of excitement to another, and left in a condition of semi-delirium as the final movement was ended.

Liszt's symphonic poem "Orpheus" was the next composition and the poetical ideas which are so beautifully expressed in it were made distinctly prominent throughout its reading by Mr. Paur. The odd "Komarinskaja" by Glinka was then given a fine performance, and the programme was ended with the same composer's overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla," which had its first performance here on this occasion. A more tuneful and brilliant ending to this decidedly remarkable programme could hardly have been chosen, and it left the audience entirely satisfied with having followed the general rule and attended to the symphony like good Boston citizens as they were.

Next Saturday night's programme has Beethoven's fourth symphony, "The Hebrides" and "Marriage of Figaro" overtures and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale as its number.

Orchestral Numbers Make Up the Symphony Program — Union Hall and Graham's Sunday Entertainments—Notes.

Hector Berlioz' fantastic symphony in C major; Liszt's symphonic poem, "Orpheus," and Glinka's Russian dance and overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla," the latter for the first time here, was the program for the 17th symphony rehearsal and concert last week. The attendance was not up to the usual standard, probably on account of the great musical attractions elsewhere. Berlioz' composition, founded on incidents in his own life, tells the story of a young composer who, being unsuccessful in his love affairs, attempts to kill himself with a narcotic, which only throws him into a slumber, in which strange visions appear to him.

The magnificent precision and harmony in execution of the orchestra was splendidly illustrated in the fantastic work. The principal, and in reality the only theme in the first movement, a melody called by the composer, "The Fixed Idea," was charmingly played in unison by the violins and flutes, the two contingents blending perfectly. In the waltz movements of the second part the sensuous swing and rhythm of the dance music was perfectly preserved, the harp part adding greatly to the beautiful waltz melody.

The contrast in the third tone picture, which is distinctly pastoral, is marked, but built upon the traditional rural plan. Here Berlioz introduces extra kettle drums with telling effect, and the simulations of a thunder storm are very striking. In this movement all the rural "accessories" have a thematic significance, and the melodic theme of love, introduced with the first notes of the opening allegro, are skilfully interwoven at oft-occurring intervals.

The peculiarities in the orchestration were carefully observed by Mr. Paur, who retained throughout a poetic interpretation which was not obscured by the realism conceived by the composer. "The March to the Scaffold" was given with grand sonorosity and breadth of tone color, the gruesome themes by the bassoons being notably solemn and suggestive of the monks' prayers for a prisoner. The brasses lagged a little in some of the measures, but the number as a whole was finely played. Diabolism reigned in the closing movement as the composer scores it, and the manner in which the conductor held his forces together was very commendable for the temptation to a chaotic hurly-burly here is very great.

The symphony poem by Liszt was gracefully interpreted. The Russian songs and dances by Glinka is one of those compositions characteristic with so many writers educated in the land of the czar, and aside from its odd repetition of a theme by the violins, played about 100 times, calls for no special commendation.

The overture by the same composer, given for the first time here, is a well-conceived and admirably orchestrated composition. It is brilliant, and abounds in strong passage work for the violins which is exceedingly difficult. The strings accomplished their work magnificently with the themes in the fantasia, their playing being clear and brilliant, and the brass contingent redeemed itself by the excellence of its harmony and tempo in the concluding coda.

The program for the rehearsal and concert this week will be the overture from "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's symphony No. 4, Mendelssohn's overture, "Hebrides," and a Schumann overture, scherzo and finale.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

[See Page Six.]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the seventeenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Berlioz: Symphonie Fantastique in C major, Opus 14 a.
Liszt: Symphonie Poem No. 4, "Orpheus."
Glinka: Komarinskaja.
Glinka: Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla," in D major.

(First time.)

It is not uninteresting to compare this programme with those of the preceding and next following concerts, for each one of the three seems to form a part of a definite scheme. The sixteenth programme was:

Handel: Concerto Grosso No. 10, in D minor.
Handel: Aria, "Honor and arms," from "Samson."
Haydn: Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 2).
Mozart: Aria, "Solche hergeleit'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail."
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont," in F minor, opus 84.

The eighteenth programme is to be:
Mozart: Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," in D major.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, opus 60.
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Hebriden," in B minor, opus 26.
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, opus 52.

Here we have three successive programmes, each one of which illustrates the development of a particular tendency—Richtung, as the Germans have it—in the art of music. The sixteenth begins with Handel, and then passes on through Haydn (the father of the symphony) and Mozart to Beethoven in his second manner. The seventeenth illustrates in a way the Liszt-Berlioz idea in composition, the programme-symphony and the symphonic poem, and then gives two characteristic examples of the Russian school, as it was specifically influenced by Berlioz. And it may be noted here that the Russian school of composition, in so far as it shows the effect of any foreign influence, owed more to Berlioz than to any other un-Russian composer until it began, through Tschairowsky, to feel the very different influence of Schumann. Thus Glinka belongs with Berlioz quite as much, if in a somewhat different way, as Liszt does. The eighteenth programme illustrates what was once known as the "modern romantic" direction in German music. It shows Mendelssohn and Schumann as the outgrowth of Mozart (the opera composer, and hence the romanticist) and Beethoven. The scheme would have been more complete had Schubert and Weber been included in it; but, even as it is, it has a certain unmistakable definiteness of purpose.

The performance on Saturday evening of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony was one of the finest we have yet heard; it was played with all the fire, delicacy, and nice attention to detail that Berlioz's writing demands. For once, we have had the symphony given exactly according to the original score; even the bells in the last movement were there.

Liszt's "Orpheus" was also capably played; Glinka's humorous "Komarinskaja," with its hundred and three consecutive measures of the same thing over and over again, was played with great precision and spirit and evidently much enjoyed by the audience. The audience, by the way, had shown, in the Fantastic Symphony, a peculiar preference, probably unique in the annals of concert-giving; it seemed to care little for either the "Scene in the Fields" or the "March to the Scaffold" (usually the most applauded movements), but fairly went into raptures over the "Walpurgis-Night's Dream!" Explain this who can.

Glinka's overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla" is a brilliant work, on the border-line between the serious and the light opera overture. It was admirably played. The next programme has already been given, and need not be repeated here.

If Mr. Paur's sixteenth programme was all conservative, his seventeenth, played last night, was thoroughly modern, and gave the best of chances for seeing how this conductor—charged at first with being a man of wood and a pedant—could yield to the influences of Berlioz, Liszt and Glinka, and play them as if his soul were in the rendering. It is safe to declare that such a superb presentation of the "Fantastic" symphony is rarely heard anywhere, and has never been heard in Boston. The orchestra was magnified, according to Berlioz's wishes, if not to his full demands. There were the four trumpets, the four bassoons, the squeaking rough little clarinets, the four kettle drums, the opheiclide, the harp, the bells of the chime, the gong and all the rest. And this little army Mr. Paur led with enthusiasm and energy to triumph, the extra men following his lead with the readiness of his elder troops. As orchestral virtuosity, the performance was superb; and as romance, legend, vision and passion in music it was almost wonderful. Master of moods no less than of the mysteries of orchestration, Berlioz would surely have applauded this reading, with its tender grace, its devotion, its terrors, its awe and its diabolism and effrontery. The symphony, which is more than an hour long, played with the intensity which the men threw into their work, would have almost made a concert of itself; but Mr. Paur had three numbers to append. These were, the generally placid and pleasant "Orpheus" idyl of Liszt, the merry, buoyant "Komarinskaja" of Glinka and the same author's overture to his "Ruslan and Ludmilla," a brief but tremendously animated composition, which was played (especially by the violins) with a dash and a brilliancy such as have not been heard before since Mr. Gericke's palmy time. Through all the programme the men played with remarkable spirit, vigor and enjoyment, to which the audience responded quickly and warmly.

For next Saturday this is the array:—Beethoven's fourth symphony and two overtures—Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Mendelssohn's "Hebrides," followed by the Overture, Scherzo and Finale of Schumann.

224
The Symphony Concert. Sanke

The programme for the concert last night, in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: Symphonie Fantastique, op 14, Berlioz; Symphonic poem, "Orpheus," Liszt; "Komarinskaja," Glinka; Overture "Ruslan and Ludmilla," Glinka. The symphony is growing aged, despite the many fine things in it, though the march remains as strong and impressive as ever, and the beauty of the "Scene in the fields" is still fresh. Dazzled no longer by the brilliancy of Berlioz's orchestration, which now seems extremely old fashioned in comparison with that of Leoncavallo in "Il Pagliacci," one can easily see how much the work is padded. It was finely interpreted by Mr. J. Paur, and with a clearness that left nothing in doubt, or to be wished for. The "Orpheus" is, as it always was, pretentious, without any compensating musical results of value, for the labor expended on it. As it seems to us, it is an excellent provocative to somnolency. It was beautifully read and played, nevertheless. The Glinka "Komarinskaja" is quaintly quaint, and inspiriting in the hearing, and is scored effectively, if coarsely. The overture does not rise above the conventional theatre overture, except in its ambitious and not always felicitous flights into imitative counterpoint; but it is tuneful. It was played, especially by the strings, with great brilliancy. Still there are overtures by Auber and Rossini that are far more worth listening to. The selections for the next concert are: Overture, "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; Overture, "Hebrides," Mendelssohn; Overture, Scherzo and Finale. Schumann.

225
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 17, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 2.
HARTMANN.	OVERTURE, "Nordische Heerfahrt." (First time.)
BRUCH.	SOLI FOR VIOLIN. ROMANZA, op. 42. (First time.)
SAINT-SAËNS.	MORCEAU de CONCERT. (First time.)
TSCHAIKOWSKY.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Romeo and Juliet." (First time.)

Soloist:

MR. C. M. LOEFFLER.

226

227

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 10, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.

OVERTURE to "Le Nozze di Figaro," in D major.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60.

I. Adagio.—Allegro vivace.

II. Adagio.

III. Menuetto: Allegro vivace.—Trio: Un poco meno allegro.

IV. Finale: Allegro, ma non troppo.

MENDELSSOHN.

OVERTURE to "Die Hebriden," in B minor, op. 26.

SCHUMANN.

OVERTURE, SCHERZO AND FINALE, op. 52.

I. Overture: Andante con moto.—Allegro.

II. Scherzo: Vivo.—Trio: l'Istesso tempo.

III. Finale: Allegro molto vivace.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eighteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Overture to "Le Nozze di Figaro," in D major.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 4, in B-flat major, Opus 60.
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Die Fingals-Höhle," in B minor, Opus 26.
Schumann: Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Opus 52.

Mozart's bright and lively overture was excellently played and put everyone in good humor, to begin with; while time lasts there will always be a place for such music. Few things could follow this overture better than Beethoven's B-flat symphony, so grave and thoughtful in its introduction, yet with such enchanting effects of color and subtlety of harmony, so heroic in its first allegro theme, like a Corybantic dance, so elegiac and exalted in sentiment in its Adagio, yet with flashes of divine humor playing through it all, as if it, too, were the sporting-ground of a Figaro brimming over with fun and saucy jokes. Ambros has called this B-flat symphony the counterpart and complement of the eighth, in F-major; in saying which he shows no common perspicacity. If every great composer is in a sense like Goethe's Earth-Spirit, who "sits at the whirling loom of Time and weaves the living garment of the God-head," these two symphonies may be said to form together a shining double, reversible garment; one side is the eighth, all woven out of mocking humor, yet with a lining of infinite seriousness, beauty, and grace, that shimmers through the humorous texture every here and there; the other side is the fourth, woven out of nobler and more earnest stuff, yet with the mocking humor of the former ever and anon shining through its tissue. The symphony was capitally played; one still wonders at the interpretation all conductors — and Mr. Paur among them — put upon Beethoven's marking, Allegro, ma non troppo in the last movement, and how fast they would take it, if it were marked, Presto. Still, one has grown so used to the now conventional rapid tempo in this movement that it certainly sounds well enough.

Mendelssohn's ever-beautiful "Fingal's Cave" overture was played with great effect; with perhaps somewhat more of variety in the tempo than the composer intended, but with the various modifications of the initial rate of speed so cleverly brought in that they did not sensibly mar the unity of impression made by the composition. Upon the whole, one inclines to call this Mendelssohn's greatest overture; it has not perhaps quite the vivid flash of genius that lights up the "Midsummer Night's Dream," but it is so perfect in every part, so ripe in feeling, and profoundly poetic in expression, that it impresses one as really the finer work of the two.

Schumann probably had other reasons for refusing to call his Overture, Scherzo and Finale a "symphony" than the mere fact that there was no slow movement in the work, and, as von Bülow once said, "he could not drive the whole quadrige." The first movement, albeit quite symphonic in form, is so entirely an overture in character, it is so complete in itself, and works up to so definite a close at the end, that it could hardly stand as a symphonic first movement; when it is over, you expect nothing further, as you do after the well-conceived first movement of a symphony. By the way, how the coda of this overture reminds one of the final working-up of the second theme in Weber's "Jubel-Ouverture"—just before "God Save the King" comes in! And yet, how utterly different the two are! There is a certain unmistakable similarity between the two themes, and much the same joyous buoyancy in the working-up of each; but how Schumann has steered clear of that vein of mere trivial brilliancy and tinsel-glitter into which Weber fell; how elegant he remains in the midst of all his joyous expansiveness! And, in the Finale, how strikingly characteristic the working-out is of one side of Schumann's nature; with what exuberance of energy he hammers and batters away at his little theme, for page after page, without making it budge a single inch! The movement might well be christened "Much Ado About Nothing," for, with all his energetic work, Schumann really gets nowhere in it; he finds himself at the end still at his starting-point. But then, also, what glorious "Ado"! The very energy with which he goes to work is in itself enough to inspire and delight one. The work was excellently played.

The next programme is: Mozart, symphony in G minor; Haydn, aria from "The Creation;" Beethoven, adagio and scherzo from symphony No. 9, in D minor, opus 125; Mozart, aria; Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mme. Lillian Blauvelt will be the singer.

THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Eighteenth Symphony—The Finale of the Opera.

The 18th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture, Marriage of Figaro.....Mozart
Symphony No. 4.....Beethoven
Overture, Hebrides.....Mendelssohn
Overture, Scherzo and finale....Schumann

The programme, which was almost stupid for the want of more contrast, was finely played by the orchestra, under the efficient and skilful conducting of Mr. Paur.

There is still demanded a more marked distinction between pianissimo and piano in the readings of Mr. Paur. The music of a programme of the above description demands that the most exact gradation of tone should be obtained, in order that the necessary contrasts shall exist.

Mr. Paur is still a little too robust in his temperament and does not seem to realize that repose is one of the greatest elements in the matter of expression.

Mr. Paur should also see that his tympani player has a softer covering for his sticks, so that in the forte passages the drums will not entirely override the tone of the orchestra and thereby destroy all effect.

I cannot understand how a musician of the sensitive nature of Mr. Paur can tolerate, much less encourage, such a nuisance as is the overwhelming noise of the drums at times.

224 230
The beautiful tone and the consummate skill of the first clarinet player in the orchestra of the grand opera at Mechanics' Hall, during the past two weeks, has not served in improving one's opinion of the tone and execution of the first clarinet of our own orchestra.

Both our tympani player and our first clarinet player can study with advantage the methods of the players of their respective instruments in the Metropolitan opera orchestra.

Next Saturday the programme will be as follows: Mozart's G minor symphony; Adagio and Scherzo, Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; and overture to "Oberon," Weber. Miss Lillian Blauvelt will sing arias by Haydn and Mozart.

Mr. Paur makes the same mistake in his arrangement of this programme as he did in his previous one. This may do for Leipzig, but it will not satisfy the demands of the more catholic taste of a Boston audience.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Paur seems to have a preference for arranging programmes which shall contrast each other rather than planning individual lists of selections which shall afford the desired contrast within their own limits. In the record of a season possibly his system has its advantages, but for the attendant upon a single concert, the result of his plan is oftentimes wearisome.

Such was the result last evening. The programme for this occasion had as its numbers "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Fingal's Cave" overtures, the fourth of the Beethoven symphonies and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale, opus 52.

Now, no one can take exception to the choice of such compositions in a programme for a concert of a class given under Conductor Paur's direction. All these numbers are well worthy a hearing, and eminently suited to create a desire for the better forms of compositions in the line of orchestral works. It is, however, questionable whether a programme of so monotonous a character tends to create the desire for this class of music which would result from presenting it in contrast with less severe and more popular selections.

Mr. William F. Apthorp, who has done so much to enlighten the public who attend these concerts through the preparation of the analytical matter which accompanies each programme, may be supposed to be acquainted with the purposes of the conductor in his general conduct of the season's concerts. This being the case, it is to be presumed that he represents Conductor Paur when he intimates that the concert of last evening was intended "to illustrate the growth of that phase of German musical romanticism that was firmly based on the preceding classic period in instrumental compositions—on Bach, Mozart and Beethoven, and was specially represented by Felix Mendelssohn and Robert Schumann." The same authority states that "the preceding programme illustrated the other and freer and more irresponsible romanticism which sprang up almost contemporaneously in France under Hector Berlioz and in Germany under Franz Liszt, and to which the Russian school of composition soon allied itself."

Admitting the desirability of these illustrative programmes (which is a large admission), Conductor Paur is to be complimented for the skill and taste shown in the arrangement of the last two concerts. The performance of the selections last evening demands no extended comment. Mr. Paur's reading of the several selections was in keeping with the reputation he has already gained here of being an eminently intelligent and conservative interpreter of standard compositions. The symphony was played throughout with admirable taste. "The Marriage of Figaro" and "Fingal's Cave" overtures were brilliantly interpreted, and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale were given a thoroughly satisfying performance. Despite the good taste shown by Conductor Paur it does seem desirable that his programme should be interesting as well as instructive, and a greater effort to arrange them with this end in view will be fully appreciated by the patrons of the symphony concert.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, soprano, will be the soloist, and Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and Weber will be drawn upon for the programme.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert, in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was: Overture, "Figaro," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, Beethoven; Overture, "Fingal's Cave," Mendelssohn; and Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Schumann. It was an interesting concert, and the performances were of that high order that Mr. Paur has taught us to expect from him. The works played are all familiar here, and there is nothing new to be said of them. The Beethoven symphony received a particularly fine interpretation. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony G-minor, Mozart; Adagio and Scherzo from symphony No. 9, Beethoven; and Overture, "Oberon," Weber. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt will be the soloist and will sing an aria from "The Creation," and an aria by Mozart.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the 18th Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

Overture "Marriage of Figaro" Mozart
Symphony No. 4 Beethoven
Overture "Hebrides" Mendelssohn
Overture, Scherzo and Finale Schumann

The concert does not call for particular comment. The numbers are familiar, and when it is said that the performance was fully worthy of the deservedly high reputation of the orchestra under Mr. Paur, the story is told. That the audience appreciated the program and the performance was shown conclusively by the hearty and prolonged applause that followed each selection. Mr. Paur was obliged to bow his acknowledgments more than once.

The program of the concert of next Saturday will be as follows: Mozart's G minor symphony; adagio and scherzo, from Beethoven's 9th symphony; overture "Oberon," Weber. Miss Lillian Blauvelt will sing airs by Haydn and Mozart.

A CLASSICAL SYMPHONY PROGRAMME.

Two Overtures and Two Symphonies Finely Performed—Marriage of Figaro Contrasted With a Recent Rendition—Jerome's New Comedy, "The Way to Win a Woman."

When the hilarious student in Germany has indulged in a wild round of dissipation, and when, on the succeeding morning, that period of deep depression known to him as "hair-ache" (far more intense and complicated than mere headache) has set in, his faithful servitor brings to him a meal composed chiefly of herring. Boston has had its round of operatic dissipation; possibly fearing that an epoch of tonal Katzenjammer had set in, our symphonic conductor had presented a musical herring in the shape of a severely classical programme on Saturday. Nothing that had not the sonata form was upon the programme; two symphonies and two classical overtures formed the penitential meal. Yet it would be wrong to give the impression that dulness ensued. A certain connection with the operatic season was established by the performance of the "Marriage of Figaro" overture as the first number, and nothing could teach the difference between music at wholesale and music heard under proper conditions than the execution of this number. It was well played in Mechanics' Hall, it was somewhat better performed at this concert, but the overwhelming difference lay in the fact that in the former case all its fragrance and delicacy was lost, while in this concert every point intended by the composer was conserved. It was perfect in performance and was not taken at the helter-skelter pace that is sometimes given to it.

Beethoven's fourth symphony was superbly played, with a clearness that shows in what fine training our orchestra is at present. One might dissent from the extreme slowness of the introduction, but that is a minor point, as a whole the reading and execution call only for unmitigated praise. The woodwind was especially excellent in the second theme of the first movement, and the little canon here was charmingly phrased and balanced. Even the kettle-drummer deserves praise for his discretion in the closing part of the adagio, and the furiously difficult passage for the contra-basses at the coda of the finale (for this symphony bears its sting in its tail) was played with a decision and surety that spoke of earnest rehearsals. This contra-bass passage, founded on the chief theme of the movement, was at the time that it was written the most difficult orchestral bit ever composed for these instruments and aroused the wittiest sarcasm on the part of Weber, who denounced it in the "Caecilia" (a musical journal of the time) with so little result that the composer duplicated his contra-bass difficulties in the Scherzo (trio part) of his next symphony. To our contra-bass players then, who so thoroughly conquered the passage on this occasion, belongs the chief praise; Palmam qui meruit ferat.

Although the rhapsodical modern school was banished from this programme, Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" overture (or "Fingal's Cave," as it is often called) gave something of the modern flavor to the list, and added sufficient contrast. If ever there was spontaneity in music it was in the case of the chief theme of this overture. This theme was written first as a letter (August 7, 1825) to his sister Fanny. In the letter he says: "In order to show you what a strange sensation has come to me on the Hebrides, I jotted down the following which came into my mind," and then follows the theme fully scored for orchestra as he afterwards employed it, a splendid instance of turning from words to a less tangible but more expressive language, to convey an impression from one musician to another.

One may fairly grow enthusiastic over Mr. Paur's reading of the work: he gave it clearness without formality, brilliancy without sensationalism. The development was full of power, the plash of the waves in that wonderful chief figure ever present. The clarinette work in the recapitulation was simply magnificent; so fine and rich a tone has seldom been heard. Mendelssohn intended some prominence for the clarinette; he and Weber may be called the discoverers of the clarinette, spite of the fact that Mozart first brought it into symphony and gave it some good passages in his rescoring of the "Messiah," for it was these two composers who first appreciated the cold spectral color of the "chalumeau" (deepest register) of the instrument, and not only this work, but the introduction to the "Scotch" symphony, the first part of "Elijah" and the incantation scene in Weber's "Freischuetz" show the skill of these masters in using this strong touch of tone-color.

Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo, and Finale" is a symphony of three movements, quite as definite in form as his other symphonies, which never became so shapely as Beethoven's. The work received a strong performance, perhaps a little heavy and rigid in the Scherzo, but certainly most effective in the finale. Altogether such a concert is a reassurance as to the standing of our orchestra; if the performances are less spicy than in the past, they are also less flippant, less sensational, decidedly more educational. One might, however, advise a more carefully prepared variety of programme. This concert was entirely classical, the next programme also ignores the most modern school, the programme of March 3 was wholly modern without any classicality whatever. There may be method in this, but one may doubt the wisdom of it. One may agree with the boarder who desired the hairs and the butter served on different plates, but there is no such valid reason why the modern school should not serve as a foil for the classical on the same programme.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur's symphony program last week was a continuation of his scheme to illustrate the different periods of musical composition, and comprised selections showing the epoch of romanticism, which was founded upon and followed the classic period, selections from the latter era having been given in the preceding concert. There were no soloists, the numbers being Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's fourth symphony, Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

The joyous Mozart overture was given with a grace and delicacy which captivated from the beginning. Devoid of stateliness and pomp, the melodic form conceived by Mozart appeal irresistibly to the humorous side of the auditor, and the odd, elf-like conceits given to the violins and wood winds are delightful examples of musical humor. These episodes were delightfully played, and in fact the whole overture was interpreted in a brilliant and dashing manner.

Beethoven's symphony No. 4 formed an excellent contrast to the Mozart number, and save a somewhat retarded tempo in the first movement the performance was highly satisfactory. A notably prominent part of the second movement was the beautiful effect of the arpeggios by the violins, which alternate with the diminuendo passages of the wood winds. The phrases seemed the perfection of harmony and sentiment. The figure given to the various instruments in sequence in the fantasia was also effective in a unique way. The running passages in the finale were deftly presented by the different contingents.

The restless, undulation themes of the "Fingal's Cave" overture brought out the ensemble precision of the orchestra in bold relief, the band presenting the Mendelssohn tone picture with great effect. The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale, with its contrast of dancing figures with a background of "sighs" received a thoroughly Schumannesque interpretation. The peculiar rhythm of the second part was perfectly preserved, the energetic theme in the finale was not made too prominent and the concluding coda was given with smoothness and rapidity and without scurrying by the violins.

The program for the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, includes Mozart's symphony in G minor, the adagio and scherzo from Beethoven's ninth symphony and Weber's overture to "Oberon." Miss Lillian Blauvelt will sing an aria from "The Creation" and an aria by Mozart.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in G minor.
HAYDN.	ARIA, from "The Creation."
BEETHOVEN.	ADAGIO and SCHERZO from Symphony No. 9.
MOZART.	ARIA.
WEBER.	OVERTURE, "Oberon."

Soloist:

MME. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

Symphony Concert.

Mr Paur's symphony program last week was a continuation of his scheme to illustrate the different periods of musical composition, and comprised selections showing the epoch of romanticism, which was founded upon and followed the classic period, selections from the latter era having been given in the preceding concert. There were no soloists, the numbers being Mozart's overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's fourth symphony, Mendelssohn's overture to "Fingal's Cave," and Schumann's overture, scherzo and finale.

The joyous Mozart overture was given with a grace and delicacy which captivated from the beginning. Devoid of stateliness and pomp, the melodic form conceived by Mozart appeal irresistibly to the humorous side of the auditor, and the odd, elf-like conceits given to the violins and wood winds are delightful examples of musical humor. These episodes were delightfully played, and in fact the whole overture was interpreted in a brilliant and dashing manner.

Beethoven's symphony No. 4 formed an excellent contrast to the Mozart number, and gave a somewhat retarded tempo in the first movement the performance was highly satisfactory. A notably prominent part of the second movement was the beautiful effect of the arpeggios by the violins, which alternate with the diminuendo passages of the wood winds. The phrases seemed the perfection of harmony and sentiment. The figure given to the various instruments in sequence in the fantasia was also effective in a unique way. The running passages in the finale were deftly presented by the different contingents.

The restless, undulation themes of the "Fingal's Cave" overture brought out the ensemble precision of the orchestra in bold relief, the band presenting the Mendelssohn tone picture with great effect. The Schumann overture, scherzo and finale, with its contrast of dancing figures with a background of "sighs" received a thoroughly Schumannesque interpretation. The peculiar rhythm of the second part was perfectly preserved, the energetic theme in the finale was not made too prominent and the concluding coda was given with smoothness and rapidity and without scurrying by the violins.

The program for the concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, includes Mozart's symphony in G minor, the adagio and scherzo from Beethoven's ninth symphony and Weber's overture to "Oberon." Miss Lillian Blauvelt will sing an aria from "The Creation" and an aria by Mozart.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in G minor.
HAYDN.	ARIA, from "The Creation."
BEETHOVEN.	ADAGIO and SCHERZO from Symphony No. 9.
MOZART.	ARIA.
WEBER.	OVERTURE, "Oberon."

Soloist:

MME. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

234

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 17, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MOZART.

SYMPHONY in G minor.

- I. Allegro molto.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto: Allegro.—Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro assai.

HAYDN.

ARIA, "With Verdure Clad" from "The Creation."

BEETHOVEN.

TWO MOVEMENTS from SYMPHONY No. 9, in D minor, op. 125.

- III. Adagio molto e cantabile.
- II. Scherzo: Molto vivace.—Trio: Presto.

MOZART.

ARIA, "Voi Che Sapete," from "The Marriage of Figaro."

WEBER.

OVERTURE to "Oberon," in D major.

Soloist:

MME. LILLIAN BLAUVELT.

NOTE.—Next week's Public Rehearsal will be held on Thursday Afternoon, to allow time to arrange the stage for the Handel and Haydn Society's Concert on Good Friday Evening.

235

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

Again the symphony concert calls for much praise and some little adverse criticism; praise for a perfection of execution that has seldom been exceeded in Boston, blame for a programme made up in a motley fashion. To give two movements from the great ninth symphony, in a city full of choristers, to change the order of the movements, to end a presentation of Beethoven's most earnest work with its lightest mood, was certainly to eliminate much of the educational and æsthetic character from the composition. Yet something may be said in extenuation, too; the last movement is not a very practicable one, it always reads better in the score than it sounds in the performance; and had the great first movement been given, it would have lacked a proper counterpoise, a balancing movement for its power, the work would have led to an anticlimax. However, it is better to let such work alone if it cannot be presented entire.

The performance began with that violet among symphonies, Mozart's G minor. It is customary to consider the "Jupiter" as the great work among the master's last group of symphonies, but to the present writer the G minor is the nobler work of art; other composers might imitate the contrapuntal skill of the former, no one but Mozart could ever have attained the delicacy, sweetness and fragrance of the latter. Barring an absence of some of the daintiness with which former conductors have invested it, the performance was an eminently satisfactory one. The grace of the chief figure of the first movement was well brought out, the violins playing excellently together, with most refined shading. The minuet was somewhat heavy and formal.

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist, and "With Verdure Clad" was a good transition to the pathos of the first theme of Beethoven's Adagio. The singer made a very good impression; at first there was a tremolo in the voice, but this probably proceeded from nervousness, for it soon disappeared, and there was good artistic work in the management of the voice, which of itself has a most agreeable timbre. Mme. Blauvelt's second number, "Voi che Sapete," again showed the advantage of hearing music under proper conditions: she sang it about as well as Mme. Arnoldson did recently in Mechanics' Hall, but it sounded infinitely better; in Music Hall not a nuance was lost, and the beautiful contrasts made their due effect. Especially to be praised was the richness of the voice in the deeper phrases; "Gelo e poi sento, l'alma avvampar" was delivered with just the broad effect on the lower tones that the phrase demanded. There were many and hearty recalls at the close of the number.

Regarding the execution of the two movements from the Ninth symphony one can only speak ecstatically; Mr. Paur is proving himself far more of an acquisition than one would have deemed possible a few months ago. He does not give the fiery moods of his predecessor, (a fire that was without any insurance and that too often burnt up the intentions of the classical composer), but he has brought the orchestra to its highest efficiency: it is again the peer of any organization of its numbers in the world. The adagio was well played, and the second violins showed that they were not inferior to their rich relations, the firsts, in this movement; but the scherzo was a revelation. It is a rhythmic fantasia, demanding constant changes of accent and of phrasing, and to conquer these with good ensemble would prove the technique of any orchestra. They were given with perfect unity and shading on this occasion, and there was just the right amount of caprice displayed even to the brusque coda. It seems impossible to choose any special points for commendation where all was so well done, but the wind instruments were remarkably effective in this part of the programme; clarinette, bassoon, oboe, horn, all were finely played, and in the final number of the concert, the "Oberon" overture, they did quite as well. Perhaps one is the more inclined to notice this since it is not so long ago that the wind instruments were the Achilles' heel of the orchestra, now they have become as strong as any department of it.

In the accompaniments, too, the orchestra made its mark, for the support of Mme. Blauvelt in the Mozart aria was as free, as elastic, as well-shaded as if it had been played on a piano by a single performer. Altogether, then, the reviewer may bear with his disappointment at the haphazard way in which the programme was made up, in view of the brilliancy of its execution; but if Mr. Paur and his men are able to win success with such a handicap, what would they attain if the list were made out in a manner to show its musical gems to the best advantage? LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC. Journal

The Nineteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt, Soprano, Was Applauded Heartily.

The program of the nineteenth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall was as follows:

Symphony, G minor.....	Mozart
"With Verdure Clad".....	Arnoldson
Adagio and Scherzo, from the 9th Symphony.....	Beethoven
"Voi Che Sapete".....	Mozart
Overture "Oberon".....	Weber

The G minor Symphony of Mozart is one of the most beautiful things in this little world. It is beautiful in its poetic thought; it is beautiful in the perfection of the expression of the thought. It has the artistic simplicity of a story of Boccaccio, of a painting by Botticelli, of one of the short Wessex tales by Thomas Hardy. It is a masterpiece in this: you cannot imagine it written in any other way. Beside the strings, Mozart only used 1 flute, 2 oboes, 2 bassoons and 2 horns; and where, pray, would you have other instruments added? The fiery or profound moderns use all instruments known to man; they invent instruments for the more complete expression of their thoughts; there is a mighty pothar; there is fretting, and there is fuming; there are effects, strange, sensuous, or heavy with thought. The perfume of modern music is apt to be pungent, hot, acrid. The perfume of Mopart's symphony is the natural perfume of a sweet and healthy woman. The modern composer's face is too often seen through his music; the face is inquiring, anxious, or vague. But Mozart wrote with serene confidence, as though he looked forward a century and foresaw that his symphony would then be as fresh, as perfect, as when he wrote it, beset by many cares.

It may be said in brief that although there was no novelty the concert, in selections and in performance, gave great pleasure. Mr. Paur made no doubtful experiment in giving two movements of the 9th symphony. There are, indeed, few symphonies that, from beginning to end, hold the attention fixed and seem one homogeneous work as does the G minor of Mozart. Did any one last evening really feel the need of the first and the fourth movements of Beethoven's gigantic symphony? The time will come when fragments of sonata, oratorios, concertos will be given as well as fragments of symphonies. When a work of large proportions is new, let it be heard as the composer wrote it, in justice to him and to the audience.

Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt, who was heard here a season ago in a Damrosch concert, gave genuine delight last evening. The agreeable quality of her voice, the vocal art displayed by her, and the modesty and the grace of her bearing combine to make her a welcome apparition on the concert stage.

PHILIP HALE.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Mme Blauvelt Sings at the Symphony.

The attendance at the symphony concert and rehearsal resumed its regular proportions last week for the great musical competitor of the previous fortnight no longer caused division in the allegiance of music lovers. Mr. Paur did not offer any orchestral novelties on the program, but the numbers were excellently interpreted, and Mme Lillian Blauvelt, a charming young soprano, reappeared in this city and sang two solo numbers. The program was as follows: Symphony, G minor, Mozart; adagio and scherzo from Beethoven's ninth symphony; overture, "Oberon," Weber, Lillian Blauvelt, an aria from "The Creation" and an air by Mozart.

The aria "With verdure clad" was not specially suited to Mme Blauvelt's voice, which, though sweet and flexible, is lacking in the warmth and breadth of tone requisite for an impressive interpretation of this familiar number. The phrasing and delivery were very artistic. Her voice easily filled the hall, and her execution was facile and generally smooth, and except the absence of that peculiar sympathetic quality needful in oratorio singing, the aria was very enjoyable.

In the air from "The Marriage of Figaro" the young artist was more successful and her sweet voice rang out clear and true, especially so in the staccato phrases, which were flute like in tone. Evidently in music of a florid and bravura nature Mme Blauvelt will achieve her greatest success, if any one may judge from her performances of last week. Her personality is very attractive and she sings without affectation, two important factors in her favor.

The Mozart symphony in G minor was treated in the proper romantic manner, the characteristics to the great audience being shown without undue exaggeration. The funny, fluttering figures of the second part, with its difficult modulations and repetitions, were sharply defined and executed with commendable precision. The finale was splendidly played.

The two orchestral movements from Beethoven's grand symphony No. 9 were artistically interpreted. The double themes of the third movement were well accentuated, the scherzo was played trippingly and in excellent time, and the curious trio was thoroughly Russian in its suggestiveness. Weber's overture to "Oberon" closed the program. The famous "orchestral crash" was given with the required energy. The whole number was brilliantly performed.

The rehearsal will be held Thursday afternoon this week to allow time to arrange the platform for the Handel and Haydn society's concert Friday evening. The symphony program will be as follows: "Faust," symphony, Liszt; berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns, first time; "Kol Nidrei," for cello and orchestra, Bruch; overture, "Calm Sea," Mendelssohn; soloist, Mr. Leo Schulz.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Paur's programme at the Symphony concert last evening was eminently in keeping with the penitential season. With Mozart, Haydn, Beethoven and Weber as composers, there was little to disturb the serenity of the audience, and had it not been that the "Oberon" overture ended the programme, there was little in it that was calculated to excite the feelings.

The Mozart symphony in G minor was placed first in the evening's selections, and had an admirable reading under Mr. Paur's direction, its simple characteristics being adhered to, and the several movements being given a graceful and enjoyable interpretation. Mr. Paur added to this symphonic selection the adagio and scherzo from the ninth of the Beethoven symphonies, and played the two movements in a very conservative fashion, which gave great gratification to the audience.

The singer of the evening was Mme. Lillian Blauvelt, an artist who has been heard before here in more brilliant selections than those which she contributed to the programme. She has a singularly pure, musical soprano voice, and, although her delivery of the aria from "The Creation," "With Verdure Clad," was lacking in style, there was a simplicity and directness in her interpretation of the number that was very charming. Her second selection was the "Voi che Sapete" from the "Marriage of Figaro," and in this selection Mme. Blauvelt's voice was heard with exquisite pleasure, her phrasing of the aria being characterized by rare intelligence, and her delivery showing admirable taste in every way.

The "Oberon" overture was splendidly played as the finale of the programme, and proved a great relief from the monotonous selections which had preceded it.

The concert of the coming week will have for its selections the "Faust" symphony by Liszt, a berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra by Clayton-Johns, the "Kol Nidrei" for cello and orchestra by Max Bruch, and Mendelssohn's "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." The soloist will be Mr. Leo Schulz. The patrons of the rehearsals are reminded that the one of the coming week will be on Thursday instead of Friday afternoon.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The nineteenth symphony programme, given in the Music Hall last Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in G minor.

Haydn: Air, "With verdure clad," from "The Creation."

Beethoven: Two movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor, Opus 125.

Mozart: Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Le Nozze di Figaro."

Weber: Overture to "Oberon."

Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the singer.

It has generally been considered part of the etiquette of symphony concerts of high order, not to give fragments of symphonies. No doubt exceptions to this rule may sometimes be in order. For instance, when there happens to be one particularly fine movement in an otherwise uninteresting symphony—such as the first movement in Rubinstein's "Ocean" symphony, or the intermezzo in Goetz's symphony in F—there seems to be no good reason why this movement should not be given by itself, without derogating from the dignity of the concert. Such movements are too fine to be shelved for good and all, and there is little artistic common sense in forcing the audience to gaze through three others, just for the pleasure of hearing the good one. Again there are choral symphonies—like Beethoven's ninth, and Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette"—which it is practically impossible to give entire as often as one would like to hear them, from the difficulty of collecting together and drilling an adequate chorus. It is hard to see why the purely orchestral parts of such works should not be given at times, leaving the choral parts for more special occasions. We have often wondered why the three symphonic movements from Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" are never given at our symphony concerts: they would be heard there to the best advantage, which they are not at oratorio concerts, simply because the acoustical conditions of a large mass of surrounding chorus-singers are not favorable to the best effect of an orchestra. The three orchestral movements in the ninth symphony might well be given without the choral finale; it would give our public a chance of hearing these wonderful movements oftener than would be possible if the work were never to be given, save in its integrity.

But these are, we think, the only cases in which it is well to dismember a work, all parts of which are ideally connected together—the only cases in which symphonic fragments can properly be given hors de leur vrai cadre at first-class concerts. With the older orchestral suites it is a wholly different matter; the several movements of these have no ideal connection with each other, and there is no internal reason why a suite by Bach or Handel should not be dismembered as much as the programme-maker pleases: nothing is lost, and often much gained thereby. But to dismember a symphony, except in the cases mentioned above, is a serious, and generally an inartistic, piece of business, only to be excused by such practical considerations as the impossibility of giving the entire work with desirable frequency.

To our mind, it was a great mistake to give the Adagio and Scherzo of the ninth symphony by themselves; to give all three of the orchestral movements, in their proper order, would have been all right; but to give these two, and out of their proper order, at that, smacks too strongly of the Kursaal or the "popular" promenade concert. It was considerably infra dig. The effect, too, was unsatisfying; one longed to hear that glorious first movement, and the two movements played left us in the position of Oliver asking for more. It might be urged that giving the "Festival at the House of Capulet," the "Love-scene," and the "Queen Mab" from Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette" was just as bad; for there are two other purely orchestral movements,—the introductory "Combats, Tumult, Intervention of the Prince," and the "Romeo at the Tomb of the Capulets,"—in that symphony. But neither of these two movements is in any way symphonic in form, and to play them in addition to the three usually given would in no wise help to round out the selections to symphonic completeness. The three symphonic movements are those commonly given. Add to this that the orchestral introduction and tomb-scene in "Roméo et Juliette" are hardly known at all to our public, and their omission is consequently not seriously felt; but the first movement of the ninth symphony is perfectly familiar, and the audience has a very realizing sense of what it is robbed of. So much on this head!

Mozart's ever-wonderful G minor symphony was admirably played. We think Mr. Paur takes the Andante too slow and heavily; the music loses much of its dreamy, poetic grace thereby, and that persistent "fluttering of angels' wings" in the violins and wood-wind is made to assume too much of the character of an obstinately worked-out problem in counterpoint. The movement sounds severe and ascetic, instead of poetic, graceful and replete with the most enchanting warmth of sentiment. But the rest of the symphony was capitally given.

Mr. Paur takes the Adagio in Beethoven's ninth, too, wonderfully slow; but here the effect is far different. Here, if anywhere, Wagner's dictum, "In a certain delicate sense, one may say of the pure Adagio that it cannot be taken slowly enough" is applicable. Some of us can remember the positively overwhelming effect Von Bülow made (in 1875-76) with his exceedingly slow tempo in the slow movement of the "Sonate pathétique;" this beauty of effect is perfectly reproducible in the Adagio of the ninth symphony; one may discuss it, but one cannot pooh-pooh it. And it can be said emphatically that, in spite of Mr. Paur's very slow tempo, the melodic flow of the music was still admirably well sustained, and its rhythmic character fully preserved. The whole movement was "well held together," as the phrase is. For one thing, the slow tempo made it easier for the orchestra to do some exceedingly beautiful bits of expressive phrasing and shading. The effect of making the fourth horn stand out so prominently (and with a certain "brassiness" of tone, too) in its descending arpeggio in the fifteenth measure, and at other corresponding points in the movement, was new to us, and struck us at first as a little crass; but the frequent recurrence of this figure, and always at the point in the theme indicated, 240 gives it a certain thematic importance in itself, and it is no bad idea to have this emphasized. Before the movement was over we found that this underscoring the horn-figure paid well enough; there was an idea, and a perfectly legitimate one, behind it. The Scherzo was brilliantly played, with Wagner's version of the horn-parts in the second theme; that this remodelling of the horn-parts is necessary for the theme to produce any effect, seems unquestionable, and no one need cry out against "Vandalism." Only we think Wagner did not go quite far enough; had he put the clarinet, and sometimes the second oboe, parts up an octave, he would have got a brilliancy of reed tone that would better have counteracted the undue prominence of the horns, as he has written them; and, curiously enough, he has applied this very device in more than one passage in his own compositions. The medium register in the wind is fully represented by his horns, and the oboes and clarinets might well have been transferred to the upper register, to give it more brilliancy and edge.

The "Oberon" overture—one of the orchestra's chevaux de bataille ever since Gerloke's day—was superbly played, and made the most brilliant effect imaginable. Only we found some of the toying with the famous horn passage superfluous and rather dandified. But the performance carried everything before it.

Mme. Blauvelt has a charming light soprano voice, well developed throughout its compass, and evidently knows a great deal about using it. She phrases at once naturally and with no little art; especially fine is the power she shows of "opening her voice" and throwing the tone well out into the house at the crucial point in a phrase. Her intonation is admirable, and she sings with great musical feeling. A certain personal charm and distinction, too, are not to be overlooked as important factors in the pleasure her performance gives. She has still something to learn, and that a person of her evident intelligence and musical organization will learn it in time and with further routine experience there can be little doubt. She has not yet quite learned to connect and fuse together all the delightful detail-effects she makes into a thoroughly consistent whole; as yet the separate details in her singing stand out somewhat too sharply as details. But she has already accomplished very much indeed, and gives promise of accomplishing more. Her singing both of the Haydn air and the incomparable "Voi che sapete" was highly delightful, and she was warmly and repeatedly recalled after both things, especially after the second.

The next programme is: Liszt, a Faust symphony; Clayton Johns, berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra (first time); Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, opus 47; Mendelssohn, overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," opus 27. Mr. Leo Schulz will be the 'cellist.

MUSIC. Sautter

The Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, had for its programme: Symphony G-minor, Mozart; the Adagio and the Scherzo, from Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist, and sang an aria from "The Creation," by Haydn, and an air from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart. The Mozart's Symphony was sympathetically read, with here and there a slight concession to the more modern methods of interpreting the older composers, but, on the whole, along the line of a discreet and artistic conservatism, and with full respect for the underlying spirit of the music. It was perfectly played from beginning to end. The two movements from the Beethoven symphony, of which the adagio is among the most exquisitely beautiful inspirations that ever came to composer, were also delightfully and impressively given, the only feature that marred the performances being the brutal thumps that the drummer gave his drum in the Scherzo. This player is very prone to pound his instruments after a fashion that prevents their emitting a musical tone. In all likelihood he grew into this bad habit under the late conductor of the orchestra; but that is no reason why he should be permitted to persevere in it. He could have studied the tone produced by the tympanist of the recent opera orchestra, with great profit. This player's tone was always musical, even in the most violent fortissimos, and the note sounded could be clearly distinguished, a result that never attends a loud note from the Symphony Orchestra player, who, at such moments, might as well knock with a hammer on the bottom of a washtub, for all that the pitch of the note he sounds can be discovered. The scherzo of the symphony has rarely had as brilliant, as spiritedly marked and as interesting an interpretation as it received on this occasion. As time passes, Mr. Paur's worth becomes more and more apparent; and he is unquestionably, taken all in all, the most eclectic, efficient and valuable conductor the orchestra has had. Mme. Blauvelt's singing of "With Verdure Clad," was tasteful, flowing in style and neat and finished generally. She made a favorable impression and at the end of the air was recalled twice with great heartiness. Her other contribution to the concert was "Voi che sapete," in the singing of which the pleasing characteristics that marked her earlier effort were equally prominent. For this, also, she received two very cordial recalls. The programme for the next concert is: "Faust" symphony, Liszt; Berceuse and Scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns (first time); "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, Bruch; Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn. Mr. Leo Schulz is to be the soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Excellent Programme Made Up of Familiar Numbers.

MR. PAUR'S COURAGE.

Beethoven's Music Treated with Loving Regard.

The Oberon Overture Very Well Given—
The Drum Again a Nuisance.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Aria, "With Verdure Clad".....Haydn
Adagio and Scherzo from Ninth symphony, Beethoven

Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist.

As all the numbers performed are familiar, comment upon the compositions is unnecessary.

It only remains to speak of the performance, which as far as the orchestra is concerned, was admirable.

The delightful Mozart symphony was finely read by Conductor Paur; he giving himself some little latitude in the expression of the andante movement, but it was only the conception of a discreet musician and was not of an exaggerated form in the least, the effect of the music being enhanced thereby.

Mr. Paur always treats the music of Beethoven with loving regard for the great master's evident intentions, and so in these two movements we were vouchsafed a remarkably faithful rendering. These movements are the only ones worthy of perpetuation in this extraordinary composition of Beethoven's latest period, and it was gratifying to hear them unencumbered with the wearisome monotone of the first movement and the eccentricities of the finale. Mr. Paur is to be commended for his courage in so happily dismembering this uncouth specimen of the immortal master of symphonic composition.

The performance of the "Oberon" overture was an excellent one, but the rendering lacked that marvellous refinement that was such a positive characteristic of unrivalled interpretations of the Weber overtures by the master hand of Wilhelm

241 Gerloke. The admirable first horn player made much of the opening phrase for horn solo, but the diminuendo of the prolonged note was marred because of the falling from the pitch. The overture was played with remarkable precision and spirit.

The tympani as usual were out of tune. In the Scherzo of the Ninth Symphony the upper drum was nearly F sharp, which did not make a harmonious concord with the contrabasses playing F natural, to which pitch the drums are expected to be tuned. Besides, F sharp given by the drums as a minor third in the key of D minor is a little queer to a musical ear against the F natural of the rest of the instruments.

The sound of these drums when subjected to the herculean thumps of the player always reminds me of the sheet-iron thunder of a theatrical storm. Mr. Paur should see that this overpowering nuisance is abated. It is the last relic of musical barbarism that existed during the incumbency of Mr. Nikisch.

Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt is quite pretty, makes a pretty appearance, and has a pretty voice, but she has been badly taught, for her voice is not correctly placed and consequently, especially in the middle tones and in the softer passages, she is obliged to sing flat of the pitch, and often with a tremulous sound and always with an apparent muscular effort.

Neither is her style to be commended, for she gives a spasmodic impulse to all ascending scales, thereby forcing her voice, the only redeeming feature being that during this effort the true pitch is reached.

The Haydn aria was taken at too slow a pace, but it was not so untuneful as the Mozart aria which was so distressingly out of tune almost from beginning to end that one does not feel called upon to regard whatever else there may have been to comment upon, as good intonation is the first requisite of the singer, and when not attained and sustained throughout as well, there is nothing to be said in praise of any accessory accomplishments.

Mrs. Blauvelt was consequently inadequate and out of place in such a programme. There are a half dozen or more choir singers in this city who could have sung both the arias infinitely better.

Now this failure to make the most of her delicate and beautiful voice must be charged to the instruction that has resulted in forbidding her accomplishing what might be creditable to her native talents and agreeable to the critical ear. Mrs. Blauvelt should seek to remedy the difficulty before it is too late.

The audience was enthusiastic over her untuneful and inartistic performance, and was joined in the demonstration by Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

Had a man violinist played as falsely and with as little skill as the showing of the singer, the fiddlers of the orchestra would have considered him a fit subject for the bastinado.

And yet such immaculate performers as our concertmaster and his immediate companions were among the most energetic of those who applauded.

I am also surprised that some of my discriminating brother critics spoke in praise of the singer's performance.

I have taken occasion to speak critically but kindly of Mrs. Blauvelt's singing, for the vocal art is in such a degraded state gives it a certain thematic importance in itself, and it is no bad idea to have this emphasized. Before the movement was over we found that this underscoring the horn-figure paid well enough; there was an idea, and a perfectly legitimate one, behind it. The Scherzo was brilliantly played, with Wagner's version of the horn-parts in the second theme; that this remodelling of the horn-parts is necessary for the theme to produce any effect, seems unquestionable, and no one need cry out against "Vandalism." Only we think Wagner did not go quite far enough; had he put the clarinet, and sometimes the second oboe, parts up an octave, he would have got a brilliancy of reed tone that would better have counteracted the undue prominence of the horns, as he has written them; and, curiously enough, he has applied this very device in more than one passage in his own compositions. The medium register in the wind is fully represented by his horns, and the oboes and clarinets might well have been transferred to the upper register, to give it more brilliancy and edge.

The "Oberon" overture—one of the orchestra's chevaux de bataille ever since Gerike's day—was superbly played, and made the most brilliant effect imaginable. Only we found some of the toying with the famous horn passage superfluous and rather dandified. But the performance carried everything before it.

Mme. Blauvelt has a charming light soprano voice, well developed throughout its compass, and evidently knows a great deal about using it. She phrases at once naturally and with no little art; especially fine is the power she shows of "opening her voice" and throwing the tone well out into the house at the crucial point in a phrase. Her intonation is admirable, and she sings with great musical feeling. A certain personal charm and distinction, too, are not to be overlooked as important factors in the pleasure her performance gives. She has still something to learn, and that a person of her evident intelligence and musical organization will learn it in time and with further routine experience there can be little doubt. She has not yet quite learned to connect and fuse together all the delightful detail-effects she makes into a thoroughly consistent whole; as yet the separate details in her singing stand out somewhat too sharply as details. But she has already accomplished very much indeed, and gives promise of accomplishing more. Her singing both of the Haydn air and the incomparable "Voi che sapete" was highly delightful, and she was warmly and repeatedly recalled after both things, especially after the second.

The next programme is: Liszt, a Faust symphony; Clayton Johns, berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra (first time); Bruch, "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, opus 47; Mendelssohn, overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," opus 27. Mr. Leo Schulz will be the 'cellist.

MUSIC. Saulte

The Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, had for its programme: Symphony G-minor, Mozart; the Adagio and the Scherzo, from Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. Mme. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist, and sang an aria from "The Creation," by Haydn, and an air from "The Marriage of Figaro," by Mozart. The Mozart's Symphony was sympathetically read, with here and there a slight concession to the more modern methods of interpreting the older composers, but, on the whole, along the line of a discreet and artistic conservatism, and with full respect for the underlying spirit of the music. It was perfectly played from beginning to end. The two movements from the Beethoven symphony, of which the adagio is among the most exquisitely beautiful inspirations that ever came to composer, were also delightfully and impressively given, the only feature that marred the performances being the brutal thumps that the drummer gave his drum in the Scherzo. This player is very prone to pound his instruments after a fashion that prevents their emitting a musical tone. In all likelihood he grew into this bad habit under the late conductor of the orchestra; but that is no reason why he should be permitted to persevere in it. He could have studied the tone produced by the tympanist of the recent opera orchestra, with great profit. This player's tone was always musical, even in the most violent fortissimos, and the note sounded could be clearly distinguished, a result that never attends a loud note from the Symphony Orchestra player, who, at such moments, might as well knock with a hammer on the bottom of a washtub, for all that the pitch of the note he sounds can be discovered. The scherzo of the symphony has rarely had as brilliant, as spiritedly marked and as interesting an interpretation as it received on this occasion. As time passes, Mr. Paur's worth becomes more and more apparent; and he is unquestionably, taken all in all, the most eclectic, efficient and valuable conductor the orchestra has had. Mme. Blauvelt's singing of "With Verdure Clad," was tasteful, flowing in style and neat and finished generally. She made a favorable impression and at the end of the air was recalled twice with great heartiness. Her other contribution to the concert was "Voi che sapete," in the singing of which the pleasing characteristics that marked her earlier effort were equally prominent. For this, also, she received two very cordial recalls. The programme for the next concert is: "Faust" symphony, Liszt; Berceuse and Scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns (first time); "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, Bruch; Overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage," Mendelssohn. Mr. Leo Schulz is to be the soloist.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

An Excellent Programme Made Up of Familiar Numbers.

MR. PAUR'S COURAGE.

Beethoven's Music Treated with Loving Regard.

The Oberon Overture Very Well Given—
The Drum Again a Nuisance.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The following was the programme:

Symphony in G minor.....Mozart
Aria, "With Verdure Clad".....Haydn
Adagio and Scherzo from Ninth symphony, Beethoven
Aria, "Voi che sapete," from "Marriage of Figaro".....Mozart
Overture to "Oberon".....Weber
Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt was the soloist.

As all the numbers performed are familiar, comment upon the compositions is unnecessary.

It only remains to speak of the performance, which as far as the orchestra is concerned, was admirable.

The delightful Mozart symphony was finely read by Conductor Paur; he giving himself some little latitude in the expression of the andante movement, but it was only the conception of a discreet musician and was not of an exaggerated form in the least, the effect of the music being enhanced thereby.

Mr. Paur always treats the music of Beethoven with loving regard for the great master's evident intentions, and so in these two movements we were vouchsafed a remarkably faithful rendering. These movements are the only ones worthy of perpetuation in this extraordinary composition of Beethoven's latest period, and it was gratifying to hear them unencumbered with the wearisome monotone of the first movement and the eccentricities of the finale. Mr. Paur is to be commended for his courage in so happily dismembering this uncouth specimen of the immortal master of symphonic composition.

The performance of the "Oberon" overture was an excellent one, but the rendering lacked that marvellous refinement that was such a positive characteristic of unrivalled interpretations of the Weber overtures by the master hand of Wilhelm

Gerike. The admirable first horn player made much of the opening phase for horn solo, but the diminuendo of the prolonged note was marred because of the falling from the pitch. The overture was played with remarkable precision and spirit.

The tympani as usual were out of tune. In the Scherzo of the Ninth Symphony the upper drum was nearly F sharp, which did not make a harmonious concord with the contrabasses playing F natural, to which pitch the drums are expected to be tuned. Besides, F sharp given by the drums as a minor third in the key of D minor is a little queer to a musical ear against the F natural of the rest of the instruments.

The sound of these drums when subjected to the herculean thumps of the player always reminds me of the sheet-iron thunder of a theatrical storm. Mr. Paur should see that this overpowering nuisance is abated. It is the last relic of musical barbarism that existed during the incumbency of Mr. Nikisch.

Mrs. Lillian Blauvelt is quite pretty, makes a pretty appearance, and has a pretty voice, but she has been badly taught, for her voice is not correctly placed and consequently, especially in the middle tones and in the softer passages, she is obliged to sing flat of the pitch, and often with a tremulous sound and always with an apparent muscular effort.

Neither is her style to be commended, for she gives a spasmodic impulse to all ascending scales, thereby forcing her voice, the only redeeming feature being that during this effort the true pitch is reached.

The Haydn aria was taken at too slow a pace, but it was not so untuneful as the Mozart aria which was so distressingly out of tune almost from beginning to end that one does not feel called upon to regard whatever else there may have been to comment upon, as good intonation is the first requisite of the singer, and when not attained, and sustained throughout as well, there is nothing to be said in praise of any accessory accomplishments.

Mrs. Blauvelt was consequently inadequate and out of place in such a programme. There are a half dozen or more choir singers in this city who could have sung both the arias infinitely better.

Now this failure to make the most of her delicate and beautiful voice must be charged to the instruction that has resulted in forbidding her accomplishing what might be creditable to her native talents and agreeable to the critical ear. Mrs. Blauvelt should seek to remedy the difficulty before it is too late.

The audience was enthusiastic over her untuneful and inartistic performance, and was joined in the demonstration by Mr. Paur and his orchestra.

Had a man violinist played as falsely and with as little skill as the showing of the singer, the fiddlers of the orchestra would have considered him a fit subject for the bastinado.

And yet such immaculate performers as our concertmaster and his immediate companions were among the most energetic of those who applauded.

I am also surprised that some of my discriminating brother critics spoke in praise of the singer's performance.

I have taken occasion to speak critically but kindly of Mrs. Blauvelt's singing, for the vocal art is in such a degraded state that every effort should be made to revive its lost high standard, and it is every critic's duty, who is competent to judge accurately of a singer's merits and demerits, to make as clear as possible what the difficulties are that handicap the public performer, and thereby assist in establishing finally a more critical judgment upon the part of the public so that the good model is easily distinguished when it is presented and commended accordingly.

242

The programme for next Saturday's concert will embrace Liszt's "Faust" symphony; Berceuse and Scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns; Kol Nidrei
for cello and orchestra, Bruch; and Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." Mr. Leo Schultz will be the soloist. The public rehearsal will be upon Thursday afternoon instead of Friday. WARREN DAVENPORT.

243

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

LISZT.

EINE FAUST-SYMPHONIE.

- I. "FAUST:" Lento assai.—Allegro agitato ed appassionato assai.
- II. "GRETCHEN:" Andante soave.
- III. "MEPHISTOPHELES:" Allegro vivace, ironico.

CLAYTON JOHNS.

BERCEUSE and SCHERZO for STRING ORCHESTRA.

- I. BERCEUSE: Andante con moto.
- II. SCHERZO: Allegro vivace.—Trio; Poco meno mosso.

BRUCH.

KOL NIDREI for VIOLONCELLO with ORCHESTRA and HARP, op. 47.

MENDELSSOHN.

OVERTURE, "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt," in D major, op. 27.

Soloist:

MR. LEO SHULZ.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

242
that every effort should be made to revive its lost high standard, and it is every critic's duty, who is competent to judge accurately of a singer's merits and demerits,
to make as clear as possible what the difficulties are that handicap the public performer, and thereby assist in establishing finally a more critical judgment upon the part of the public so that the good model is easily distinguished when it is presented and commended accordingly.
The programme for next Saturday's concert will embrace Liszt's "Faust" symphony; Berceuse and Scherzo for string orchestra, Clayton Johns; Kol Nidrei
for cello and orchestra, Bruch; and Mendelssohn's overture, "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage." Mr. Leo Schultz
will be the soloist. The public rehearsal will be upon Thursday afternoon instead of Friday. WARREN DAVENPORT.

243
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 24, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

LISZT.

EINE FAUST-SYMPHONIE.

- I. "FAUST:" Lento assai.—Allegro agitato ed appassionato assai.
- II. "GRETCHEN:" Andante soave.
- III. "MEPHISTOPHELES:" Allegro vivace, ironico.

CLAYTON JOHNS.

BERCEUSE and SCHERZO for STRING ORCHESTRA.

- I. BERCEUSE: Andante con moto.
- II. SCHERZO: Allegro vivace.—Trio: Poco meno mosso.

BRUCH.

KOL NIDREI for VIOLONCELLO with ORCHESTRA and HARP, op. 47.

MENDELSSOHN.

OVERTURE, "Meeresstille und Glückliche Fahrt," in D major, op. 27.

Soloist:

MR. LEO SHULZ.

There will be no Public Rehearsal and Concert next week.

ABOUT MUSIC.

What is the meaning of all this talk about the possible resignation of Mr. Paur?

In Le Ménestrel, published at Paris, March 18th, is this paragraph: "Some time ago, we announced that the position of Conductor of the Symphony Orchestra at Boston had been offered without favorable result to the chief Conductors in Germany, and Mr. Paur was persuaded finally to accept it. We are forced to believe that the position is an unpleasant one in spite of the enormous salary attached to it, because Mr. Paur has made known his intention to resign and return to Germany."

The following paragraph was published in the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, Berlin, March 23: "Information, said to be trustworthy, comes from Boston to the effect that Mr. Paur has no thought of giving up his position there and returning to Europe. He is, on the contrary, so pleased that he intends to fulfill his contract for 10 years, particularly as the critics and the public applaud his work."

Last week a prominent musical newspaper in New York, published the statement that Mr. Higginson has been negotiating for a successor, "and there is a faint possibility of Wilhelm Gericke returning to his old post."

There is no use of denying the fact that there is here in Boston a certain opposition to the methods of Mr. Paur, the conductor. This opposition is not found in the musical articles contributed to the press of Boston. Nor do I believe that there is any substantial opposition on the part of the audience to Mr. Paur.

It is true, however, that certain members of the orchestra do not hesitate in public to condemn the conducting of Mr. Paur and to sneer at his musical intelligence.

These objectors are few in number, but they undoubtedly have a certain influence.

It is not improbable that their policy is shaped by the determination of Mr. Paur to be conductor, in deed as well as in name.

Now ideal government has been defined as absolute despotism tempered by occasional assassination.

I do not understand that Mr. Paur is disagreeable at rehearsal; but it is said that he insists on having his own musical ideas, i. e., his interpretation of the composer's meaning carried out without question by the men who are paid by Mr. Higginson to obey the leader chosen by him, whether the name be Gericke, Nickisch or Paur.

It is also stated that Mr. Paur has a contract for five years with the privilege of renewal, and he has no intention of leaving a position that pleases him. As he is a man of firmness, it is not likely that he will be disturbed seriously by the mutterings of a few discontented players, or by the thought of Mr. Nickisch in Pesth, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter.

There are changes that might well be made next season in the personnel of the orchestra.

The first clarinet is not the equal of his associates. The horns as a quartet are comparatively weaker brethren. And the kettle drum man should be given an opportunity to exercise his strength in some ruder land.

It is true that this drummer is agile, yet in dexterity is he surpassed easily by the Burmese, who perform in all sorts of apparently impossible positions, as behind the back, over and under the shoulders, under the legs, and, no doubt, while standing on the head.

This drummer with his dull ear and passion for noise was born out of due time. Years ago in Mexico a beautiful youth was sacrificed to Tezcatlipoca. And when after preparatory stuffing, and rejoicing, and festal procession the victim was put upon the altar of Jasper, a mighty drum was pounded. Bernal Diaz saw the drum. It was made of serpents' skins. The sound of it was so loud that it could be heard eight miles away.

If this drummer is as dear to Mr. Paur as the apple of his eye, why does he not bring him forward in an heroic solo? We are obliged each year to listen to certain violinists and cellists of the orchestra in set solo pieces. However admirable their performances may be, it would be a pleasure to partake of the joy of variety. The selection of soloists seems, like kissing, to go by favor, particularly when two such remarkable performers as Marteau, the violinist, and de Pachmann, the pianist, now in this country, are not given a hearing.

I believe that this drummer was once heard in an elaborate solo at a promenade concert, but why should he not be invited to appear at one of the 24 solemn functions? There is a piece that he might play, a solo for six kettle drums, accompanied by full orchestra, written by Tausch. It is in two movements, slow march and polonaise. Of course, the indulgence of the audience should be requested during the tuning.

And at another concert one of the trombone players might be heard, say in an arrangement of Stigelli's "Tear."

One thing may justly be said of Mr. Paur: however great his merits as a conductor may be, he is not skillful in the composition of his programs. It is my impression that he means to be catholic in selection; but he apparently has little sense of values and he does not appreciate the power of judicious contrast.

It is given to few to present such interesting programs as those arranged by Mr. Frank Van der Stucken, who, by the way, is a conductor to be at least considered if Mr. Paur should by any chance make up his mind to return to Germany. Some here would at once object to Mr. Van der Stucken: for he was born in this country, he is not a German by birth or by parentage, and he believes in giving the works of the modern school a hearing, whether they be written by Frenchmen, Belgians, Germans, Russians, Italians, Americans, Barbarians or Scythians. These objections are indeed insuperable—that is, in Boston—and I hasten to withdraw the suggestion. Let us fold the hands and resign ourselves to an endless succession of Schmidts and Muellers, for they are the people, and music will die with them.

It is to be hoped that there will not be any change at present. Mr. Paur seems to be an honest, capable man, seeking to perform thoroughly the duties of his position, and not courting in any way self-glorification. Under his direction the orchestra has recovered the perfection of technique that, gained under Mr. Gericke, was frittered away under Mr. Nickisch. It should be understood thoroughly by the men under him that he, as conductor, has a right to fine even the most prominent if they are late at a rehearsal; nor should he be maligned because he insists that he is master in all questions of tempo and nuancierung.

PHILIP HALE.

The Symphony Concert.

Again a display of great skill in conducting and performance, and absolute lack of tact and discretion in the formation of the programme. At the preceding concert Mr. Paur cut out the first movement of the great Ninth symphony; at this one he religiously gave every note of the interminable first movement of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, causing late-comers a wait of over half an hour in the corridor. The soloist of the concert began his work at half past nine, and the last number of the strange programme was played to many empty benches and to the boot-heel obbligato of many a departing auditor. The programme book stated that Liszt's symphony was given for the first time, but it has been heard in Boston before the present symphony orchestra was founded. It was then given with its proper ending, a chorus with words taken from Goethe's "Faust."

The first movement is a fearful picture of musical spasms; Faust in his struggles seems greatly to disturb the regular sonata shape, and all symphonic meaning (in the modern sense) is lost in vague growlings, having about as much shape as a London fog. At the end of the movement one is inclined to ask, with Southey's "young Peterkin," "Now tell us what 'twas all about?" It is a well-known fact in oratory that when a man has nothing to say, he takes a long while saying it, and here we find the same principle illustrated in music. Yet viewed purely as a bit of orchestral scoring, with no particular object, the work has a certain interest, it contains some unique bits of instrumental effect.

The second movement, picturing Marguerite, is much the best of the symphony. It is frequently given alone, a custom which our conductor might have followed to advantage. The work of the oboe and of the muted violins in this movement was exquisite, but there was some rigidity of phrasing in the most delicate passages.

In the third movement Liszt has brought ethics into music; to picture Satan as the destroyer, powerless to create, there is no definite theme given to this part, but almost everything is founded on a mockery of the themes which have been presented in the preceding two movements. Possibly this fact may stand as an excuse for the infliction of the first movement upon the audience, but few could have appreciated this ethical touch, and these elect ones must have thought with the boy who had just completed his mastery of the alphabet, that it was not worth while going through so much to learn so little. Yet the general Diablerie of the movement is not without its charm, and it was played to perfection, a veritable technical triumph on which conductor and orchestra are to be congratulated. The omission of the final chorus was not a defect, for Liszt had this omission in view when he wrote the ending used on this occasion. In the full version Liszt gives an apotheosis of Marguerite in singing of "Das Ewig-weibliche," while in this finale the apotheosis is made by turning from the malevolent measures of Mephistopheles to a beatification of the Faust and Marguerite themes. But even to the end the spasmodic character is kept up, the work is a thing of magnificently colored shreds and patches, and when the musical hiccoughs ended with the kettle-drummer rapping violently to call the meeting to order, one was satisfied that the hour and a quarter of dissonance was quite sufficient without an added chorus.

Clayton Johns' melodic measures came like cold cream after inflammation. Under other circumstances, one might have held the Berceuse too light for symphonic concert use, but now the gentle passages of muted violins were cordially welcome. The scherzo which followed is a very concise bit of writing; like the Berceuse, it charms by straightforward melody only; its themes are well contrasted and graceful, and the carillon-like returning passage is also in place, but one could demand a larger form in an orchestral work. The composition won much applause. Now, at the time when suburbs take their trains, came Mr. Leo Schulz with a short violoncello solo. It was Bruch's arrangement of the old Hebrew melody, "Kol Nidrei." This note of Jewish musical sorrow came rather sardonically on Easter eve, yet it made a great success. "Kol Nidrei" is probably the oldest Jewish theme in existence; many tunes are ascribed to Scriptural times, but they are always found wanting when weighed by the antiquarian. "Leoni" is given in many hymn-books as coming down from the Temple at Jerusalem, but people must accept the statement entirely on faith. "Kol Nidrei" itself does not go back so very far; its general style is Moorish, and it probably only carries us back to the time when the Sephardic Jews lived with the Moors in Spain. Mr. Schulz played with noble expression and the breadth of his C string was remarkable. He was recalled many times.

There was an evident haste to bring one number on the heels of another, caused by the length of the programme. Immediately that the cello solo was done Mendelssohn's "Becalmed at Sea and Prosperous Voyage" was rushed on. One was glad not to find the work marked on the programme as "Calm Sea and Happy Voyage;" this title has misled more auditors than one would imagine, and of itself shows the delusive character of programme music. Many listen to the first measures and imagine a tranquil and smiling sea, while the picture (which at once calls to mind a stanza from Coleridge) is taken from Goethe's verses:—

"Deepest stillness on the waters
Without motion rests the Sea,
And the Sailor sees around him
Only flat monotony.

Not a breath of air is stirring,
Awful silence, as the Grave;
In the whole wide, vast horizon
Moveth not a single wave."

The earnest introduction was taken a trifle too quickly, but the transition to the picture of the ship ploughing its way through the waves, homeward-bound, was excellently read, and the body of the work was brilliantly executed, even to the trumpet fanfares and the final bursting forth of the irrepressible kettle-drummer.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mr. Leo Schulz.

General Interest in the Music Drama
Performances—A Grand Floral Concert Announced—The Women's Philharmonic Orchestra to Appear—
"Tabasco" an Early Attraction.

It is easy to forgive Mr. Paur for his recent sins of omission and commission in the way of programme making after hearing the concert of last evening.

Upon this occasion he made a very happy choice of his compositions, and arranged them in such a way that, although they covered an unusual amount of time, there was no sense of weariness during the performance, and his audience left the hall with an agreeable feeling of having enjoyed the entire list of selections.

The evening was begun with a splendid performance of Liszt's "Faust" symphony, which had, so far as memory serves, its first performance here on this occasion. It might with more propriety be called a series of three symphonic poems having for their subjects Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles. There is little in either of the three movements into which this work is divided that suggests purely symphonic form, and the free style in which the several subjects are treated is hardly in keeping with the traditions suggested by the word symphony. In the first movement, "Faust," the composer shows that he is not above borrowing from himself, but although the ideas and themes seem familiar, their treatment and development gives to the movement as a whole a degree of originality which makes it steadily interesting. It is difficult to say just what the themes suggest, but to those who are not compelled to have the programme before them in order to enjoy this class of compositions, the movement is steadily pleasing. In its scoring the composer has used all the resources of the modern orchestra, and in a way to present a series of tone pictures of the most fascinating character.

The "Gretchen" movement is full of poetic characteristics, and very suggestive of the subject treated, the development and working out of the themes being in a style strongly in contrast to those of the first movement. It is in the third movement, however, that Liszt gives himself the greatest freedom, and his writing in this part of the symphony is irresistibly amusing as well as vastly entertaining. The themes of the first and second movements are here parodied in the cleverest fashion, and the Mephistophelian style of the movement was caught up in the happiest fashion by the players, who, with their conductor, evidently enjoyed this part of the work quite as much as the audience.

Following the symphony came another comparative novelty, consisting of the berceuse and scherzo written for stringed orchestra by Clayton Johns. This delightfully dainty and melodious composition was played with charming grace, and displayed the taste of the conductor and his command over his men in the happiest fashion.

The soloist of the evening, Mr. Leo Schulz, was then introduced in the "Kol Nidrei" of Max Bruch, for cello, orchestra and harp. The noble melody selected by the composer for treatment in this bit of writing was played with admirable sentiment by Mr. Schulz, and his broad and tasteful treatment of the main subject showed him to be a thorough master of his instrument. The orchestral and harp parts of the composition were equally satisfactory, and the selection has, as a whole, never had a better interpretation here than on this occasion.

The programme was brought to a most enjoyable ending by a thoroughly artistic performance of the "Calm Sea and Prosperous Voyage" overture.

The orchestra makes its occasional tour during the coming week, and the concert on Saturday evening, April 7, will be in memory of Hans Guido von Bulow. The programme on this occasion will have as its novelty Bulow's "Funerale," and will include the "Eroica" symphony by Beethoven. Mr. Otto Roth will be the soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

[See Page Eight.]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twentieth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Liszt: A Faust Symphony.
Clayton Johns: Berceuse and Scherzo for string orchestra.
Max Bruch: "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello with orchestra and harp, Opus 47.
Mendelssohn: Overture, "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," Opus 27.

Mr. Leo Schulz was the cellist.

It is a good many years since all three movements of Liszt's "Faust" symphony have been given here; the second movement, "Gretchen," has been given separately now and then, but we doubt if many in last Saturday evening's audience remembered a note of the other two. Indeed it is no slight undertaking to give the work entire—nor to listen to it, for matter of that. It is enormously difficult, and lasts from sixty-five to seventy minutes—well over an hour! Of Liszt's two great symphonies—perhaps large would be the better word—the "Dante" and the "Faust," we must own to liking the "Faust" decidedly best. Both works are sharply characteristic of the composer, but in the "Faust" he seems to have worked under the influence of a more real inspiration.

The symphony may be called a monstrosity, without any one's needing to object. It shows all Liszt's faults in generous measure: his terrible and unflagging self-consciousness, his vain struggling after naïveté, his want of artistic measure, his general bent toward exaggerated expression. The first movement, in particular, furnishes more than one instance of the tediousness, the lack of true musical vitality, in his peculiar method of thematic development. Liszt seems to have had a passion for developing a theme in what is called sequence; the idea was not original with him, indeed, it is probably as old as thematic development itself; but his application of it is in one respect quite individual. It may be said of this plan of "development in sequence" that its prime artistic weakness lies in the fact that it is a cut-and-dried scheme from the start, and consequently almost necessarily precludes that constant display of inventiveness and felicity of resource that constitutes one of the greatest charms of thematic working-out. Its most obstinate and unstinted application is probably to be found in the free fantasia of the first movement of Adolph Saran's B-flat minor pianoforte sonata, Opus 5; and it is doubtless this very fact that best accounts for the exceedingly short-lived reputation this in many ways remarkable work enjoyed with musicians. But only examine these sequences in Saran's sonata, and you find that, cut-and-dried and formal as the scheme is, the result is by no means devoid of musical life and charm. Saran begins his working-out with a phrase of four measures, and then repeats it twice more, each time a semitone higher; then he adds a phrase of six measures, to round off the period. This whole period is then repeated, a tone lower than before. Then Saran begins another period (still on the same theme), in which phrases of two measures alternate with and are answered by other phrases of two measures, the sequence rising tone by tone with each repetition. Then comes still a third period, in which the phrase (still taken from the same theme) is only one measure long, the sequence now descending tone by tone with each repetition of the phrase. Here we have the scheme, which, cut-and-dried as it is, has a strong element of liveliness in it; this beginning with a sequence of four-measure phrases, then going on to two-measure, and at last to one-measure phrases, presents the thematic material in a more and more condensed shape, and makes the fencing between question and response ever more lively and rapid. But, when Liszt develops a phrase in sequence, he does little or nothing of this successive condensation of periods. Take the passage in alternate 4-4 and 6-4 time, marked "Meno mosso, misterioso e molto tranquillo," in the first movement of his "Faust" symphony; here he works up a phrase two measures long in sequence, repeating it nine times, changing key with every other repetition; but it is always one and the same phrase, over and over again, without variety and without any quickening of the diastole-systole of question and answer. The process becomes terribly tedious after a while, especially as this repeating the same thing over and over again without variation has no plastic, form-giving virtue whatever. The whole sequence sounds like mere reiteration, and says nothing more than was said in the first two phrases. We have thought it worth while to go into this matter at such length, because this lazy, absolutely cut-and-dried sort of development in sequence is a device of which Liszt is particularly fond, and the frequent application of which is perhaps the very dreariest feature in his compositions; in fact, this process cannot strictly be called one of development in any true sense of the word; the effect upon the ear is that of a sort of thematic marking-time, for the theme so treated really does not progress at all. There is more than one instance of this sort of thing in the symphony, albeit Liszt has been somewhat more merciful to the listener in this respect here than in his "Ideale."

Then, too, take the terribly tense and high-strung mood that pervades the work, the persistency of that uncomfortable, nervous interval of the augmented fifth almost throughout the first movement. This constant emotional high-pressure becomes frightfully wearing; after a while one begins to find this perpetual harping on the E-string of morbid sensibility unnatural and unreal; this constant acuteness of feeling and high nervous tension seem all too factitious and self-conscious. Again, take the second "Gretchen" movement; with all its undeniable musical beauty, what a terrible satire it is on Liszt's favorite maxim, "Il faut toujours tâcher de faire grand!" As a musical character-picture of Goethe's Gretchen, it is almost a blasphemy. Only think of anyone's trying to treat Gretchen "on a large scale!" This movement might pass as a character-picture of Madame de Genlis, or any high-strung sentimental-poetic female you please; but of Goethe's Gretchen, never!

Still, with and in spite of all its characteristic Lisztian blemishes, the symphony is unquestionably interesting, and something more. There is an enormous amount of work in it, and the sentiment in it seems throughout deeper and more genuine than one usually finds in

248
Liszt. It is full of passages of really dazzling brilliancy, and the music sticks to its purpose unflinchingly. Then there is throughout the wonderful, aromatic charm of Liszt's orchestration, always individual and delightful. In the third, "Mephistopheles," movement Liszt has plainly owed much to Berlioz—indeed, the whole idea of the movement may be said to have been taken directly from the "Songes d'une Nuit du Sabbat" in the "Fantastic" symphony—but Liszt has made admirable use of his stolen idea; the "irony" in the music is essentially Mephistophelian and heartlessly brilliant. We are quite free to own that, after the "Preludes" and "Tasso," this "Faust" is the first extended orchestral composition by Liszt that we have really enjoyed. The performance was, for the most part, superb, and showed the music in a most brilliant light.

Mr. Johns's Berceuse and Scherzo are two pretty little movements, and were pretty well played. Their absolute and unassuming simplicity was grateful after Liszt's high-strung complexities.

Mr. Schulz played Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" very beautifully indeed, but we cannot but find the composition itself dull and tedious. The real "Kol Nidrei" itself, when intoned by the high priest in the synagogue on the Day of Atonement, is said to be unspeakably impressive, grand and solemn. But try to be grand and solemn with a solo 'cello! That sugar-sweet voice is not tuned to solemnity.

Mendelssohn's ever-welcome "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" was capitally played and heartily enjoyed by all. There is descriptive and picturesque music that never for a moment forgets to be musical as well!

The next programme (for April 6 and 7, there will be no concert nor rehearsal this week) is to be in memoriam of the late Hans Guido von Bülow. Bülow, "Funerale;" Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), opus 55; Molique, two movements from violin concerto; Brahms, "Tragic" overture, opus 81; Wagner, Huldigungs-Marsch. Mr. Otto Roth will be the violinist.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Echoes from the Twentieth Symphony Program—Sacred and Secular Music in the Theaters Tonight—Coming Events.

A program of unusual length was provided by director Paur for the last symphony concert of the Lenten season. The offerings were as follows: "A Faust Symphony," by Franz Liszt; berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra, by Clayton Johns; "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello, with orchestra and harp, by Max Bruch, and an overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," by Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

The Liszt symphony was played for the first time here. It is an excessively long composition, requiring an hour and a quarter for performance, and in spite of its many beauties proved rather a severe tax on the attention of the audience.

The work is really three symphonic poems rather than a symphony and is intended to be descriptive of Goethe's characters, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles.

Like most of Liszt's compositions, this work is notable for elaborate ornamentation. The several themes are in themselves simple and suggestive, and they are treated in a very effective manner.

Especially effective is the manner in which the themes of the first two movements are reproduced in the third movement in the form of sarcastic parodies. This is strikingly in accord with the popular idea of the methods in favor with Mephistopheles.

The Gretchen movement is exceedingly sweet and delicate, but it is so full of repetitions in slightly varied forms that the sweetness becomes rather monotonous before the end. The symphony was splendidly played by the orchestra.

The Clayton Johns' berceuse and scherzo were exquisitely interpreted. Not before has a similar composition been played with more grace, delicacy or artistic expression under Mr. Paur's direction. It is a charming work and has added materially to the success already won by this Boston composer from Symphony concert patrons.

The "Kol Nidrei" is the first prayer by the Jewish high priest in the synagogue on the Day of Atonement, and it is the ritual melody of this prayer which Max Bruch has taken for the principal theme of his composition. It is, of course, very somber in character, but its performance was listened to with pleasure. Mr. Leo Schultz played the solo 'cello splendidly and was cordially applauded.

The final number was Mendelssohn's overture, and the superb manner in which this delightful descriptive composition was played made it rather the most enjoyable offering of the concert.

There will be no Symphony concert this week. The program for the following week will be arranged in memory of Von Bülow, and the selections will be as follows: A funeral march by Von Bülow; Beethoven's Symphony, "The Heroic;" two movements from Molique's first violin concerto, Otto Roth, solo violin; Brahms' "Tragic Overture;" Wagner's "Huldigungs-Marsch."

MUSIC. Saville

The Symphony Concert.

249
The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was "A Faust Symphony," by Liszt; a Berceuse and a Scherzo, for string orchestra, by Clayton Johns; "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello and orchestra, Bruch; Overture, "Calm sea and Prosperous voyage," Mendelssohn. Mr. Leo Schulz was the soloist. The Liszt symphony is a dreary, musical nightmare, which occupies one hour and ten minutes in the playing. What it all means, musically or otherwise, defies explanation. What connection it has with "Faust," beyond the title, is equally puzzling to determine. It might be called a Hamlet symphony with just as much propriety and just as much intelligibility, but whatever its title, it would not appear any less foggy, less disagreeable, less vulgarly blatant or less wearisome. It was read and played finely, of course, but an hour and ten minutes of such groping after nothing in particular is too much to contemplate with equanimity, after one has been subjected to it. Mr. Johns's two pieces are dainty little musical meringues that gratify a sweet tooth without satisfying the appetite. They are prettily tuneful, and savor of the salon rather than of the concert room. They were charmingly played. Mr. Schulz played the 'cello solo in that broad, clean cut and musicianly style that always distinguishes his performances, and was heartily applauded. The selections for the next concert are: "Funerale," Von Bülow; Eroica Symphony, Beethoven; two movements from a concerto for violin, Molique; Tragic Overture, Brahms; Huldigungs-Marsch, Wagner. Mr. Otto Roth is to be the soloist.

The latest reports give the gratifying assurance that the Symphony concerts are not to be abandoned, that Mr. Paur will continue to revel in the pastoral joys of Jamaica Plain and that the musicians, from head fiddler to drummer, are devoted to their conductor and would fain die for him that injurious, base reports might be forever disproved. The rehearsals are looked forward to with eagerness. A loving-cup is passed about before the hard labor of the forenoon, and during the moments of rest Mr. Paur tells funny stories from the Fliegende Blaetter or even older works. Every now and then, at rehearsal, the musicians cheer, so delighted are they with Mr. Paur's readings of both great and little masters. Barnum's happy family was a collection of Niobes, Rachels and Dismal Jimmies compared with the Symphony Orchestra as it is to-day.

oloist:

OTTO ROTH.

Liszt. It is full of passages of really dazzling brilliancy, and the music sticks to its purpose unflinchingly. Then there is throughout the wonderful, aromatic charm of Liszt's orchestration, always individual and delightful. In the third, "Mephistopheles," movement Liszt has plainly owed much to Berlioz—indeed, the whole idea of the movement may be said to have been taken directly from the "Sonnet d'une Nuit du Sabbat" in the "Fantastic" symphony—but Liszt has made admirable use of his stolen idea; the "irony" in the music is essentially Mephistophelian and heartlessly brilliant. We are quite free to own that, after the "Préludes" and "Tasso," this "Faust" is the first extended orchestral composition by Liszt that we have really enjoyed. The performance was, for the most part, superb, and showed the music in a most brilliant light.

Mr. Johns's Berceuse and Scherzo are two pretty little movements, and were pretty well played. Their absolute and unassuming simplicity was grateful after Liszt's high-strung complexities.

Mr. Schulz played Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" very beautifully indeed, but we cannot but find the composition itself dull and tedious. The real "Kol Nidrei" itself, when intoned by the high priest in the synagogue on the Day of Atonement, is said to be unspeakably impressive, grand and solemn. But try to be grand and solemn with a solo cello! That sugar-sweet voice is not tuned to solemnity.

Mendelssohn's ever-welcome "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" was capitally played and heartily enjoyed by all. There is descriptive and picturesque music that never for a moment forgets to be musical as well!

The next programme (for April 6 and 7, there will be no concert nor rehearsal this week) is to be in memoriam of the late Hans Guido von Bülow. Bülow, "Funerale;" Beethoven, symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), opus 55; Molique, two movements from violin concerto; Brahms, "Tragic" overture, opus 81; Wagner, Huldigungs-Marsch. Mr. Otto Roth will be the violinist.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Echoes from the Twentieth Symphony Program—Sacred and Secular Music in the Theaters Tonight—Coming Events.

A program of unusual length was provided by director Paur for the last symphony concert of the Lenten season. The offerings were as follows: "A Faust Symphony," by Franz Liszt; berceuse and scherzo for string orchestra, by Clayton Johns; "Kol Nidrei," for violoncello, with orchestra and harp, by Max Bruch, and an overture, "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," by Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy.

The Liszt symphony was played for the first time here. It is an excessively long composition, requiring an hour and a quarter for performance, and in spite of its many beauties proved rather a severe tax on the attention of the audience.

The work is really three symphonic poems rather than a symphony and is intended to be descriptive of Goethe's characters, Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles.

Like most of Liszt's compositions, this work is notable for elaborate ornamentation. The several themes are in themselves simple and suggestive, and they are treated in a very effective manner.

Especially effective is the manner in which the themes of the first two movements are reproduced in the third movement in the form of sarcastic parodies. This is strikingly in accord with the popular idea of the methods in favor with Mephistopheles.

The Gretchen movement is exceedingly sweet and delicate, but it is so full of repetitions in slightly varied forms that the sweetness becomes rather monotonous before the end. The symphony was splendidly played by the orchestra.

The Clayton Johns' berceuse and scherzo were exquisitely interpreted. Not before has a similar composition been played with more grace, delicacy or artistic expression under Mr. Paur's direction. It is a charming work and has added materially to the success already won by this Boston composer from Symphony concert patrons.

The "Kol Nidrei" is the first prayer by the Jewish high priest in the synagogue on the Day of Atonement, and it is the ritual melody of this prayer which Max Bruch has taken for the principal theme of his composition. It is, of course, very somber in character, but its performance was listened to with pleasure. Mr. Leo Schultz played the solo cello splendidly and was cordially applauded.

The final number was Mendelssohn's overture, and the superb manner in which this delightful descriptive composition was played made it rather the most enjoyable offering of the concert.

There will be no Symphony concert this week. The program for the following week will be arranged in memory of Von Bülow, and the selections will be as follows: A funeral march by Von Bülow; Beethoven's Symphony, "The Heroic;" two movements from Molique's first violin concerto, Otto Roth, solo violin; Brahms' "Tragic Overture;" Wagner's "Huldigungs-Marsch."

MUSIC.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was "A Faust Symphony," by Liszt; a Berceuse and a Scherzo, for string orchestra, by Clayton Johns; "Kol Nidrei," for cello and orchestra, Bruch; Overture, "Calm sea and Prosperous voyage," Mendelssohn. Mr. Leo Schulz was the soloist. The Liszt symphony is a dreary, musical nightmare, which occupies one hour and ten minutes in the playing. What it all means, musically or otherwise, defies explanation. What connection it has with "Faust," beyond the title, is equally puzzling to determine. It might be called a Hamlet symphony with just as much propriety and just as much intelligibility, but whatever its title, it would not appear any less foggy, less disagreeable, less vulgarly blatant or less wearisome. It was read and played finely, of course, but an hour and ten minutes of such groping after nothing in particular is too much to contemplate with equanimity, after one has been subjected to it. Mr. Johns's two pieces are dainty little musical meringues that gratify a sweet tooth without satisfying the appetite. They are prettily tuneful, and savor of the salon rather than of the concert room. They were charmingly played. Mr. Schulz played the cello solo in that broad, clean cut and musicianly style that always distinguishes his performances, and was heartily applauded. The selections for the next concert are: "Funerale," Von Bülow; Eroica Symphony, Beethoven; two movements from a concerto for violin, Molique; Tragic Overture, Brahms; Huldigungs-Marsch, Wagner. Mr. Otto Roth is to be the soloist.

The latest reports give the gratifying assurance that the Symphony concerts are not to be abandoned, that Mr. Paur will continue to revel in the pastoral joys of Jamaica Plain and that the musicians, from head fiddler to drummer, are devoted to their conductor and would fain die for him that injurious, base reports might be forever disproved. The rehearsals are looked forward to with eagerness. A loving-cup is passed about before the hard labor of the forenoon, and during the moments of rest Mr. Paur tells funny stories from the Fliegende Blaetter or even older works. Every now and then, at rehearsal, the musicians cheer, so delighted are they with Mr. Paur's readings of both great and little masters. Barnum's happy family was a collection of Niobes, Rachels and Dismal Jimmies compared with the Symphony Orchestra as it is to-day.

oloist:

OTTO ROTH.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XXI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 7, AT 8, P. M.

IN MEMORIAM HANS GUIDO VON BÜLOW.

BORN JANUARY 8, 1830.

DIED FEBRUARY 12, 1894.

PROGRAMME.

HANS VON BÜLOW.

FUNERALE. op. 23, No. 4.
(First time.)

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 3, in E flat major. (Eroica.) op. 55.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.—Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro molto.—Poco andante.

MOLIQUE.

TWO MOVEMENTS from CONCERTO for VIOLIN,
No. 5, in A minor, op. 21.
II. Andante.
I. Allegro.

BRAHMS.

TRAGIC OVERTURE, in D minor, op. 81.

Soloist:

MR. OTTO ROTH.

The Twenty-first Concert of the Symphony Orchestra—A Remarkable Performance of Beethoven's Third Symphony.

The twenty-first concert of the Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. The program was as follows:

Funerale, op. 23, No. 4.....von Buelow
(First time.)
Symphony No. 3 (Eroica).....Beethoven
Two movements from concerto for violin.....Molique
No. 5, A minor, op. 21.
II. Andante.
I. Allegro.

Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms
The program of this concert was arranged as a memorial service in honor of the late Hans Guido von Buelow. As Buelow died the 12th of February, the tribute came late, but, as some one said, it takes a long time to bury a distinguished man.

Tschaikowsky, who is one of the greatest composers for orchestra of the last 20 years, died this season and Mr. Paur made no sign. His last symphony, a work that is hailed as a masterpiece in European cities and in New York, has not even been put in rehearsal here.

Gounod's death this season was mourned publicly at the Gewandhaus, Leipzig, but Mr. Paur made no sign. And yet no one will argue seriously that Buelow outranked Gounod as a composer.

Not that Buelow is to be grudged this tribute. He was a great, if at times eccentric, orchestral leader. His face, his playing of the piano, his sarcastic wit were well known in this town, and although there may not have been in the audience a sense of personal loss, as often happens when composers, strangers to us, die, nevertheless the tribute was deserved.

This tribute, by the way, would have been more complete if Mr. Paur had refused to put on the program one of Buelow's compositions; for this strange and versatile musician did not shine as a composer. To be sure, the orchestra might have played Buelow's overture to "Julius Caesar;" and in comparison with that dull enormity, the Funerale is like unto a baleful star in the firmament.

The feature of the evening was the superb performance of the Heroic Symphony. Superb is a large, full word, often loosely used; but such a performance as that of last evening is rare. Not only was there scrupulous attention to detail; not only was there a fortunate and a sane choice of tempi; but under the direction of Mr. Paur there was no thought of orchestral pedagogy or magnetic virtuoso. The one thought was, How great is this music; and not, How admirably the leader conducts. Although the first movement was not played in the fixed, rigid spirit dear to some conservatives, the changes in tempo, slight, but effective, seemed the inevitable expression of the composer's ideas. The performance of the funeral march was free from theatrical extravagance; it was healthy and virile in its grief; there was no cheap suggestion of threadbare crape and tears; it was a lament with a mighty lamentation. Most excellent, too, was the rhythmic precision of the scherzo, and it may here be remarked that the pianissimo of Mr. Paur is a pianissimo, not a restless itch for a piano or a mezzo forte. The variations were played magnificently, and it was a relief to find that the poco andante was not dragged out beyond recognition, and that simplicity was not turned into sentimentalism. All in all, it was a great performance, and Mr. Paur was seconded most ably by the men under his control.

O. Bernhard Molique, you played one of your concertos in Paris in 1836, and you were then praised as a composer rather than as a virtuoso. For years your concertos were a delight to violinists. But this is another age.

"King Pandion, he is dead,
All thy friends are left in lead."

And to this restless generation your compositions for violin are in the limbo where are found pieces compounded of sugar and amiable bravura; yes, and your own oratorio, "Abraham," is there with many another vocal work, sacred or profane.

Mr. Roth played the peaceful numbers smoothly and with delicacy.

Molique, by the way, was born in 1803, not in 1802 as stated by the program book.

Next Saturday evening Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be given. Mr. George Riddle will be the reader, and there will be a chorus of members of the Cecilia.

PHILIP HALE.

VON BULOW'S MEMORY.

The Twenty-first Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall Saturday evening. The programme, "In Memoriam Hans Guido Von Buelow"—born Jan. 8, 1830, died Feb. 12, 1894—was as follows:

Funerale, op. 23, No. 4.....Bulow
(First time.)

Symphony No. 3, "Eroica".....Beethoven
Andante and Allegro from Violin Concerto No. 5, Molique

Tragic Overture.....Brahms
Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist.

The great feature of this programme was the superb rendering of the Beethoven Symphony, by the orchestra, under the exacting baton of Conductor Paur, who now has such a mastery over the efforts of the players that he was enabled to present his noble conception of Beethoven's masterpiece of symphonic composition with a degree of expressiveness, discriminating tempi and rhythmical excellence that was well nigh faultless. Such a fine reading and such perfect playing seldom go hand in hand. Mr. Paur has now established his reputation as an almost unrivalled interpreter of the Master Beethoven. The audience recognized the wonderfully elevated and highly expressive rendering of the symphony with applause, at once spontaneous and prolonged, which Mr. Paur modestly acknowledged.

There is little to be said in praise of the recent eminent pianist's "Funerale" movement. It is scored in the modern mode and is skilfully managed in this direction, but it is, nevertheless, a dry and uninspired effort upon the part of its author, and fails in its effect to move the listener.

It is as a player of the highest intellectual order and a pedagogue of rare ability that Von Buelow must be remembered.

The smooth, flowing Andante and the florid and brilliant Allegro of the Molique Concerto furnished Mr. Otto Roth a fine opportunity wherein to display his clear and ample technique, both as a player of cantabile and the difficulties of rapid technical work. Mr. Roth's intonation was remarkably correct. Although the work is old-fashioned and perhaps tedious to the listener, it was well chosen by the player to exhibit his best qualities. Mr. Roth was heartily applauded after his playing and was recalled.

The concert ended with a magnificent performance of Brahms's unmelodic but effective overture.

It is said that Mr. Paur has been disciplining some of his players lately for not getting to rehearsals on time. It would be well if he would discipline himself also, and begin the concerts on time. On Saturday he came on the stage 10 minutes after 8 o'clock. This made the performance drag beyond the hour at which it should have ended, and caused a great exodus of patrons before the concert was finished.

Mr. Paur also shows very poor judgment in arranging his programmes as regards their length. The programmes this evening was 10 minutes over the reasonable duration of one hour and a half, and had the Huldigung March followed the Brahms Overture as Mr. Paur first planned, it would have been a most tedious experience.

A large number of the subscribers to these concerts are suburbanans, and must necessarily leave at a certain time in order to catch their trains. Mr. Paur should recognize this fact and remedy the difficulty by beginning at 8 o'clock promptly, and arranging his programme so that it shall end by 9.30.

Next Saturday evening Mendelssohn's music to "Midsummer Night's Dream" will be given, with the assistance of a chorus of members of the Cecilia. Mr. George Riddle will read from Shakespeare's lines.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

AS TO MR. PAUR.

The Foolishness of the New Rumor—His Work.

The Musical Courier of New York has had a recurrence of its former complaint, i. e., the discharge of Conductor Paur from the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the end of the present season.

In its present aberration it disposes of Conductor Paur as "having been weighed in the scales of criticism and found wanting."

Its former hallucination, appearing in its columns in the form of a prediction that Mr. Paur would only remain during one season, has overcome its reason again, and it now asserts that Mr. Higginson has been negotiating for Mr. Paur's successor, with a faint possibility that Mr. Gericke will return to his old post.

It would be interesting to know the source of the information that produces these occasional aberrations on the part of our esteemed contemporary.

Mr. Higginson says that Conductor Paur is engaged for a term of years, and Conductor Paur says that he is engaged for five years with the privilege of an additional five years if he desires.

Mr. Paur is now laying his plans for next season's series, and will be so busy with the affairs of his position as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that he will not go abroad this summer. These facts hardly warrant a claim that he will be discharged or resign.

He has already rehabilitated the orchestra and is now its master. The musical barbarism that existed during the four seasons that Nikisch encumbered the position of conductor has, with the exception of the infernal pounding of the tympani, been eradicated. It is reported that there will be changes in the membership of the band at the expiration of the present season, among which will be the engagement of a first clarinet player to replace the present incumbent brought here by Nikisch, a player whose efforts when he first began here were, in the opinion of many, hardly above those of a clever amateur.

254
27

Undoubtedly the exacting discipline of Conductor Paur has disturbed the go-as-you-please inclinations of many of the players who in this direction enjoyed a sort of picnic under the laxity of Nikisch's incompetency.

That business is all over now, and whoever remains under the baton of Conductor Paur will find that he is positive in his conception and able to enforce his ideas of its rendition, regardless of any inclination, whims, or inattention upon the part of the players engaged to do his bidding.

The Musical Courier admits that Mr. Paur is an excellent musician and conductor, and in the same breath remarks that there are at least half a dozen conductors in this country his superiors. Well, if there are a half dozen such, none of them are to be found in New York. The Boston Transcript, which the Musical Courier taunts, will be able to crow over its New York contemporary next fall as lustily as will the Republican party over the beginning annihilation of the Democratic crew that has scuttled its craft with the auger of free silver and free trade, and gone to bottom helpless in the midocean of its political idiocy. In the slang of the day, "come off," gentlemen of the Musical Courier, and "give us a rest" on this subject of the future conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur, through his superior ability, made Leipzig forget your friend Nikisch, and he has done Boston the same service.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

See End of Vol. for more on this subject
MUSIC. Gazette

Mischievous Musicians.

Certain people in New York seem to be very much disturbed about the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and are full of good advice to Mr. Higginson regarding the course he should pursue in order to maintain the efficiency of the organization. This is amusing when it is considered that the orchestra has never been in a higher state of efficiency than it is under the direction of Mr. Paur. For some reason or other, the writers for the press, in New York, who are averse to the present conductor, never plummeted the depths of their rapture for Mr. Nikisch, under whom the orchestra steadily degenerated until it was in sore danger of losing the front rank it had obtained as one of the leading orchestras of the world.

There is good reason for believing that these periodical attacks on Mr. Paur originate with certain disgruntled members of the orchestra, who, having rejoiced under the lax discipline of Mr. Nikisch, revolt at the severer discipline to which they are subjected by his successor. It has become notorious that these discontents, only three or four in number, lose no opportunity that offers, to disparage Mr. Paur in the most scandalous fashion, and it would seem that, under the circumstances, the most advisable course to pursue would be to dispense with their services, and to fill their places with other players, and to permit them to find situations under conductors who countenance the "hall fellow, well met" methods with their men, that these performers favor, but which Mr. Paur opposes. As far as we have been able to discover, Mr. Paur has the respect and the esteem of his whole orchestra, except these few prominent men among the string players; and he also enjoys the best consideration of the whole musical public, save that of some young composers whose music he has not thought it advisable to perform, for doubtless good reasons, and that of the leader of a well-known clique here who has been unable to use him as he was able to use Mr. Nikisch.

None who have had any experience with large orchestra can possibly be surprised to hear of the petty backbitings, the small jealousies, and the treachery generally, of which they are capable. When Mr. Gericke first came, he was hailed with enthusiasm. After a short time the fault-finding, the disparagement and the contemptible backbiting began, and it was not long before he was in high disfavor with his men; and even those who pretended brotherly love for him when in his presence, ridiculed and snarled at him behind his back. It was the same with Mr. Nikisch. At the outset there went up a cry of perfect delight over him. By and by the usual order of things prevailed, and the backbiting, the belittling, the growling and the adverse criticism, on both professional and personal grounds, began. Here, again, the most zealous scandalizers were those who were most trusted by him, and those who were most sycophantic to him when in his company. A like course has followed Mr. Paur's coming hither. At the beginning, all was laudation. He was a delightful man, a fine musician, and a brilliant conductor. This jubilation continued for the regulation period, and then came the inevitable table-turning. In a short article, intended to be humorous, and which appeared in these columns shortly after Mr.

Paur's engagement was announced, we dwelt on this theme, and prophesied exactly what has happened. And it can be prophesied with perfect safety of the orchestra's treatment of any conductor, whether his name be Paur, or Richter, or Colonne and which could be prophesied with similar certainty of Mr. Kniesel, if, by any curious oversight of fate, he should be appointed conductor.

Let us hasten to add, however, that the whole orchestra must not be blamed for the paltriness of a few firebrands. With the exception of these troublesome mischief-makers, Mr. Paur, we are assured, has the entire respect and sympathies of his men. The malcontents have been over-pampered with popularity, social and otherwise, and assume an importance that does not really attach to them. They appear to think that they are indispensable to the success and well-being of the orchestra, whereas, the truth is, that their places could be readily filled for the better. It is these, who, when in New York, supply certain papers there with news which they know to be false, merely for the purpose of stimulating sentiment against their conductor.

One paper there has stated: "There is very little likelihood of Mr. Emil Paur being retained as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next season. He has been weighed in the scales of criticism, and found wanting." The facts are that Mr. Paur's engagement is for five years, and, as we understand, with the privilege of renewal for five more. And, so far from being true is it, that criticism has been adverse to him, it has been exceptionally unanimous in his favor. This same paper says: "Boston's famous band has gone off in flimsy and musical enthusiasm." And this, after the dreadful degeneracy to which it sunk under Mr. Nikisch, and its steady recovery under Mr. Paur, until it has reached a higher state of efficiency and of brilliancy in its work than it ever manifested before. All that can be said of the course followed by Mr. Paur's detractors, under the inspiration of the handful of chronic malcontents in his orchestra is, that "the wish is father to the thought." It is to be seriously doubted if the destinies of the orchestra and its conductor are to be influenced from such a distance as New York, by the few soured "kickers" against proper and necessary discipline, to be found in the ranks of the players. It is not easy to find so able a conductor as is Mr. Paur. It is more than easy to find as able, and even more able performers than those who are making all the trouble. As a matter of expediency, it would seem that the orchestra should be purged of its mischief-making malcontents, who, it is quite safe to say, are as plausibly friendly to Mr. Paur, before his face, as they are miserably treacherous to him, behind his back.

Mr. Paur Speaks.

The Boston Journal, in its Friday evening edition, published the following very interesting interview with Mr. Paur, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be seen that it sets completely at rest the malicious reports that have obtained currency here and in New York, and which were evidently inspired by some members of the orchestra:

Mr. Emil Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, smiled patiently when, in the presence of a Journal reporter, he read the latest account of his professional fate. A morning paper of this city, after digesting all the baseless reports concerning Mr. Paur which have appeared quite regularly in some of the New York papers, decided to announce to-day that "the rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived." It added that, "while there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gericke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization."

255

Mr. Paur's smile began to appear as he slowly studied the foregoing quotations, but when he learned, further along, the ideas of his contract with Mr. Higginson, possessed by some persons, he laughed in a plying way. Then he handed back the paper to the Journal reporter, remarking: "There's nothing in that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying."

This denial was sufficient, but, being asked by the reporter for a statement of the terms and conditions of his contract, he said:

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for ten years. For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am contented to stay here. I am very contented to stay here," and Mrs. Paur, who had come into the room to enjoy a laugh at the story, nodded assent.

"In the first place, Col. Higginson is a man of eminent character, and the public, the press, and the critics have treated us most kindly."

"Everywhere, in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say, perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur, "when we were in New York the last time, friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Damrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

"I think so, perhaps," nodded the director.

"I am a man of no favorites. I know my duty and I want others to know their duty. I am going along a straight path to the performance of that duty, and I want others to do the same. I have observed a disposition to be a trifle careless among a few of the players." He was talking more to himself than to the reporter, as if recalling some circumstance to prove his reflections. "But," he said, suddenly speaking as firmly as he could, "Col. Higginson has told me not to permit careless players to be members of the orchestra, and I won't. I want to do my duty."

"Mr. Paur feels," remarked the musician's wife, "that he is here for the good of the orchestra, and he wants the players to feel that they, too, are here for the good of the orchestra." Mr. Paur smiled and nodded. "The longer he stays here the stronger he will become, and the others will go when they do not do their duty"; and Mr. Paur bowed his head once more in approval.

ship of the band at the expiration of the present season, among which will be the engagement of a first clarinet player to replace the present incumbent brought here by Nikisch, a player whose efforts when he first began here were, in the opinion of many, hardly above those of a clever amateur.

Undoubtedly the exacting discipline of Conductor Paur has disturbed the go-as-you-please inclinations of many of the players who in this direction enjoyed a sort of picnic under the laxity of Nikisch's incompetency.

That business is all over now, and whoever remains under the baton of Conductor Paur will find that he is positive in his conception and able to enforce his ideas of its rendition, regardless of any inclination, whims, or inattention upon the part of the players engaged to do his bidding.

The Musical Courier admits that Mr. Paur is an excellent musician and conductor, and in the same breath remarks that there are at least half a dozen conductors in this country his superiors. Well, if there are a half dozen such, none of them are to be found in New York. The Boston Transcript, which the Musical Courier taunts, will be able to crow over its New York contemporary next fall as lustily as will the Republican party over the beginning annihilation of the Democratic crew that has scuttled its craft with the auger of free silver and free trade, and gone to bottom helpless in the midocean of its political idiocy. In the slang of the day, "come off," gentlemen of the Musical Courier, and "give us a rest" on this subject of the future conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Paur, through his superior ability, made Leipsic forget your friend Nikisch, and he has done Boston the same service.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

See Study Vol. for more on this subject

MUSIC. Gazette

Mischievous Musicians.

Certain people in New York seem to be very much disturbed about the future of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and are full of good advice to Mr. Higginson regarding the course he should pursue in order to maintain the efficiency of the organization. This is amusing when it is considered that the orchestra has never been in a higher state of efficiency than it is under the direction of Mr. Paur. For some reason or other, the writers for the press, in New York, who are averse to the present conductor, never plummeted the depths of their rapture for Mr. Nikisch, under whom the orchestra steadily degenerated until it was in sore danger of losing the front rank it had obtained as one of the leading orchestras of the world.

There is good reason for believing that these periodical attacks on Mr. Paur originate with certain disgruntled members of the orchestra, who, having rejoiced under the lax discipline of Mr. Nikisch, revolt at the severer discipline to which they are subjected by his successor. It has become notorious that these discontents, only three or four in number, lose no opportunity that offers, to disparage Mr. Paur in the most scandalous fashion, and it would seem that, under the circumstances, the most advisable course to pursue would be to dispense with their services, and to fill their places with other players, and to permit them to find situations under conductors who countenance the "hall fellow, well met" methods with their men, that these performers favor, but which Mr. Paur opposes. As far as we have been able to discover, Mr. Paur has the respect and the esteem of his whole orchestra, except these few prominent men among the string players; and he also enjoys the best consideration of the whole musical public, save that of some young composers whose music he has not thought it advisable to perform, for doubtless good reasons, and that of the leader of a well-known clique here who has been unable to use him as he was able to use Mr. Nikisch.

None who have had any experience with large orchestra can possibly be surprised to hear of the petty backbitings, the small jealousies, and the treachery generally, of which they are capable. When Mr. Gerlicke first came, he was hailed with enthusiasm. After a short time the fault-finding, the disparagement and the contemptible backbiting began, and it was not long before he was in high disfavor with his men; and even those who pretended brotherly love for him when in his presence, ridiculed and snarled at him behind his back. It was the same with Mr. Nikisch. At the outset there went up a cry of perfect delight over him. By and by the usual order of things prevailed, and the backbiting, the belittling, the growling and the adverse criticism, on both professional and personal grounds, began. Here, again, the most zealous scandalizers were those who were most trusted by him, and those who were most sycophantic to him when in his company. A like course has followed Mr. Paur's coming hither. At the beginning, all was laudation. He was a delightful man, a fine musician, and a brilliant conductor. This jubilation continued for the regulation period, and then came the inevitable table-turning. In a short article, intended to be humorous, and which appeared in these columns shortly after Mr.

Paur's engagement was announced, we dwelt on this theme, and prophesied exactly what has happened. And it can be prophesied with perfect safety of the orchestra's treatment of any conductor, whether his name be Paur, or Richter, or Colonne, and which could be prophesied with similar certainty of Mr. Kneisel, if, by any curious oversight of fate, he should be appointed conductor.

Let us hasten to add, however, that the whole orchestra must not be blamed for the paltriness of a few firebrands. With the exception of these troublesome mischief-makers, Mr. Paur, we are assured, has the entire respect and sympathies of his men. The malcontents have been over-pampered with popularity, social and otherwise, and assume an importance that does not really attach to them. They appear to think that they are indispensable to the success and well-being of the orchestra, whereas, the truth is, that their places could be readily filled for the better. It is these, who, when in New York, supply certain papers there with news which they know to be false, merely for the purpose of stimulating sentiment against their conductor.

One paper there has stated: "There is very little likelihood of Mr. Emil Paur being retained as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next season. He has been weighed in the scales of criticism, and found wanting." The facts are that Mr. Paur's engagement is for five years, and, as we understand, with the privilege of renewal for five more. And, so far from being true is it, that criticism has been adverse to him, it has been exceptionally unanimous in his favor. This same paper says: "Boston's famous band has gone off in finish and musical enthusiasm." And this, after the dreadful degeneracy to which it sunk under Mr. Nikisch, and its steady recovery under Mr. Paur, until it has reached a higher state of efficiency and of brilliancy in its work than it ever manifested before. All that can be said of the course followed by Mr. Paur's detractors, under the inspiration of the handful of chronic malcontents in his orchestra is, that "the wish is father to the thought." It is to be seriously doubted if the destinies of the orchestra and its conductor are to be influenced from such a distance as New York, by the few soured "kickers" against proper and necessary discipline, to be found in the ranks of the players. It is not easy to find so able a conductor as is Mr. Paur. It is more than easy to find as able, and even more able performers than those who are making all the trouble. As a matter of expediency, it would seem that the orchestra should be purged of its mischief-making malcontents, who, it is quite safe to say, are as plausibly friendly to Mr. Paur, before his face, as they are miserably treacherous to him, behind his back.

Mr. Paur Speaks.

The Boston Journal, in its Friday evening edition, published the following very interesting interview with Mr. Paur, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be seen that it sets completely at rest the malicious reports that have obtained currency here and in New York, and which were evidently inspired by some members of the orchestra:

Mr. Emil Paur, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, smiled patiently when, in the presence of a Journal reporter, he read the latest account of his professional fate. A morning paper of this city, after digesting all the baseless reports concerning Mr. Paur which have appeared quite regularly in some of the New York papers, decided to announce to-day that "the rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived." It added that, "while there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gerlicke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization."

Mr. Paur's smile began to appear as he slowly studied the foregoing quotations, but when he learned, further along, the ideas of his contract with Mr. Higginson, possessed by some persons, he laughed in a pitying way. Then he handed back the paper to the Journal reporter, remarking: "There's nothing in that at all. It's all what you call—er—oh—lying."

This denial was sufficient, but, being asked by the reporter for a statement of the terms and conditions of his contract, he said:

"I have a contract with Col. Higginson for ten years. For that term of years I am bound, but if at the end of five years Col. Higginson should desire to terminate our relations, a clause in the contract gives him the privilege to do so on the payment of $10,000.

"It is not true, as you see, according to the contract, that on the payment of $5000 my resignation can be asked for immediately. I am bound here absolutely for five years. Neither Col. Higginson nor myself can release ourselves from this part of the contract, in a way, for he is bound to the contract and I am contented to stay here. I am very contented to stay here," and Mrs. Paur, who had come into the room to enjoy a laugh at the story, nodded assent.

"In the first place, Col. Higginson is a man of eminent character, and the public, the press, and the critics have treated us most kindly."

"Everywhere, in this city, in Washington, in Baltimore, in Philadelphia, in Brooklyn—everywhere, except in New York, we have been well received. These stories started in New York, you know. Perhaps Nikisch or Seidl were the authors of them. I say, perhaps. I do not know."

"Yes," said Mrs. Paur, "when we were in New York the last time, friends told us that Nikisch sent out those stories. Some even said that Seidl and Danrosch were the cause of them. They were orchestra players who told us that, too; but I think, and Mr. Paur thinks, that some of the players themselves may have originated the articles."

"I think so, perhaps," nodded the director.

"I am a man of no favorites. I know my duty and I want others to know their duty. I am going along a straight path to the performance of that duty, and I want others to do the same. I have observed a disposition to be a trifle careless among a few of the players." He was talking more to himself than to the reporter, as if recalling some circumstance to prove his reflections. "But," he said, suddenly speaking as firmly as he could, "Col. Higginson has told me not to permit careless players to be members of the orchestra, and I won't. I want to do my duty."

"Mr. Paur feels," remarked the musician's wife, "that he is here for the good of the orchestra, and he wants the players to feel that they, too, are here for the good of the orchestra." Mr. Paur smiled and nodded. "The longer he stays here the stronger he will become, and the others will go when they do not do their duty"; and Mr. Paur bowed his head once more in approval.

WILL PAUR STAY?

Col. Higginson's Hope of a New Leader.

Post: Apr. 6-94

The rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived.

This time it comes from New York, in which city Colonel Higginson now is.

While there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give a very favorable coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gericke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization.

A Post man talked yesterday with several people who are in positions to know of these things.

"Mr. Paur," said one of this number, "may be with the orchestra next season, but I am inclined to believe that another man will occupy the position if Colonel Higginson can arrange matters.

"Despite what may be said, the statement is true that Mr. Paur has not the qualities possessed by his predecessors which endeared them to the music-loving public. He is not so popular with his audiences, and the orchestra's repute and efficiency are not increased as they have been before.

"He is to my mind inferior in his position to any of those who have preceded him. It would not surprise me to see Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again with the orchestra next season."

Apropos of the Gericke possibility, on the authority of a friend who talked with him recently, it may be stated that that musician has repented his refusal of the offer extended to him when Mr. Nikisch left, and would accept the position willingly if again tendered.

Gericke, in conversation with the Boston friend mentioned, stated that had he known that he was wanted here by the public generally, as well as by Colonel Higginson, he should have left Vienna.

One act of omission on the part of Colonel Higginson is believed to mean more than any act of commission yet done by him.

It has always been customary at the last concert of the season in New York, Philadelphia, Washington and other cities to announce on the printed programmes the concerts for the next season, their number, and the name of the leader.

This year the programmes appeared without a word of announcement.

This was in direct contravention of the custom which has been observed for at least ten years.

The inference is that Colonel Higginson, expecting to make a change before next season, preferred to omit the announcement altogether rather than to print one without a leader's name, which would undoubtedly have attracted greater attention.

The annual trip westward will be omitted this spring, also, although the stated cause—the financial depression—may be responsible for this.

Still, a depression does not generally affect such events as the Symphony concerts.

Mr. Paur is generally believed to have come over for a five years' stay. The breaking of contract which his dismissal would mean must be compensated for. Five thousand dollars is understood to be the figure which will be paid him.

This sum will be no inducement to him to leave, however. One who knows him quite well said:

"Leader Paur will stay if he possibly can, and it will be the shattering of all his hopes if he is not directing the Symphony Orchestra next season.

"A matter of $5000 is nothing. To leave his position and return to Europe after one season would mean failure—would have an effect on the minds of the musical world which he can by no possibility afford."

The situation seems to be that Herr Paur wants to stay, Colonel Higginson doesn't want him to stay, and the Symphony admirers generally have preferences for a more magnetic leader.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Funerale, Von Bülow (first time); "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; two movements from Concerto No. 5, for violin, Molique, and Tragic overture, Brahms. The soloist was Mr. Otto Roth. The "Funerale" was given in memory of the late Hans Von Bülow. It is somewhat more coherent than the other music of his that we have heard, and somewhat less noisy. It is well made, and richly instrumented, and is, of course, in the extreme modern style. It is not especially impressive, and seems vague and on the whole wearisome on a first hearing. It showed its composer's excellent musicianship, but it did not strike us as showing anything more. The Beethoven Symphony received splendid treatment at the hands of Mr. Paur. The nobility of style in which he read it was in refreshing contrast with the spasmodic and quasi-operative manner in which it had been given by his predecessor. The tempi were just; the pace of the funeral march being notably so. There were few departures from the conservative reading of the work, and there was only an occasional retarding of the time for the more effective emphasizing of a phrase. Taken altogether, it was as masterly and as satisfying an interpretation of the work as it has ever had at these concerts, and was applauded in a spirit of hearty appreciation. The movements of the Molique concerto are clear, melodious, and have an easy and delightful flow. It is true that they sound a little old-fashioned, but it is a genuine musicianly old fashion. Mr. Roth played them brilliantly, and with irreproachable finish of style. In the matter of fluent and able technique, perfect intonation, phrasing, and grace of expression, nothing was left to wish for. In other respects, there was a lack of virility, but that seems to be a marked characteristic of the violinists of the orchestra who appear as soloists each season. Their playing is always charming in its elegance, its precision and its fluency, but it is curiously similar in its absence of largeness, of vigor and of what is understood as inspiration. In other words, viewed from its technical standpoint it is admirable, but viewed from the standpoint of broad and manly playing, it seems finical, wanting in intellectuality, and displaying the finger-skilled and the bow-clever virtuoso, rather than the solid and earnest musician. It is all very pretty and very interesting, and is creditable to the industry, the ambition, and the talent of the artists, but it never exemplifies such supreme qualities as to do away with the desire to hear a really great violinist, now and then, at these concerts. Mr. Roth, however, acquitted himself tastefully and well and fairly deserved the hearty applause and the recalls that rewarded his efforts. The programme for the next concert is Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. George Riddle is to be the reader, and the choruses will be sung by members of the Cecilia.

IT SEEMS to be difficult for several of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to realize who is in control. They have been so pampered, and have had things their own way, so long, that they have grown into overrating their importance. Hence, when one of them makes it a habit of coming late to rehearsal, and is subjected to a fine, by way of bringing him to a sense of the desirability of punctuality, he is astounded at the daring of the self-reliant conductor who thus disciplines him. Another player, who sinks into his chair, like a musical Mr. Smallweed, and fiddles in a listless manner, as if he were playing under protest and had no interest in his work, whatever, when requested to sit up and put more vigor into his performances, feels insulted to the very depths of his soul, and can scarcely realize that any conductor should be so presuming as to take him to task for not doing his duty properly. Then, there are one or two pretty darlings who are more interested in the graceful motion of their bow-wrist over the top of their large shirt-cuffs than they are in the music they play; and these also feel that they are wronged when they are disciplined, and very properly, into the right course. These people appear to think that the audience assembles to look at and to admire them, rather than to listen to the music. It is very likely, that, by and by, they will, through bitter experience, be brought to a sense of the true state of affairs, and will then concede, though perhaps unwillingly, that the conductor, particularly the able conductor, is, after all, the most important figure in the orchestra, and that when he is resolved to have his own way, it is useless in his subordinates to kick against his authority. In all such cases, when there is any humiliating to be done, it is the rank and file, and not the commanding officer who must suffer it.

Just why Hans von Bülow should have had an elegiac concert in Boston, when that sort of respect was paid neither to Gounod nor Tschalkowsky, does not appear obviously, unless the reason be that he was a German, while neither of them was. Any how a goodly proportion, if not the whole of the audience at last night's symphony concert must have regretted his death sincerely, because it was the excuse for weighing down their spirits with one of the gloomiest and least interesting programmes which even Mr. Paur's poor judgment in such matters has compounded. It began with a "Funerale" composed by the late lamented, which fortunately was not very long and was rather expressively developed in a Wagnerian fashion from a melancholy theme first propounded by a cheerful choir of bassoons, horns and violas. The treatment of this subject was musicianly and was worked up a couple of times or so to a good deal of sonority and strength. The composer had had the consideration to end its lugubrious minor monody with a few bars in the major mode, but the impression left was still sepulchral. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony followed—noblest of works in its kind, grand, grave even in its lighter

WILL PAUR STAY?

Col. Higginson's Hope of a New Leader.

Post: Apr. 6-94

The rumor that Emil Paur will not lead the Symphony Orchestra next season has again been revived.

This time it comes from New York, in which city Colonel Higginson now is.

While there is nothing positive or definite about the statements which are being made, certain circumstances give a very favorable coloring to them, and it would be by no means strange if next season should find Leader Wilhelm Gericke again wielding the baton in Boston's pet musical organization.

A Post man talked yesterday with several people who are in positions to know of these things.

"Mr. Paur," said one of this number, "may be with the orchestra next season, but I am inclined to believe that another man will occupy the position if Colonel Higginson can arrange matters.

"Despite what may be said, the statement is true that Mr. Paur has not the qualities possessed by his predecessors which endeared them to the music-loving public. He is not so popular with his audiences, and the orchestra's repute and efficiency are not increased as they have been before.

"He is to my mind inferior in his position to any of those who have preceded him. It would not surprise me to see Mr. Wilhelm Gericke again with the orchestra next season."

Apropos of the Gericke possibility, on the authority of a friend who talked with him recently, it may be stated that that musician has repented his refusal of the offer extended to him when Mr. Nikisch left, and would accept the position willingly if again tendered.

Gericke, in conversation with the Boston friend mentioned, stated that had he known that he was wanted here by the public generally, as well as by Colonel Higginson, he should have left Vienna.

One act of omission on the part of Colonel Higginson is believed to mean more than any act of commission yet done by him.

It has always been customary at the last concert of the season in New York, Philadelphia, Washington and other cities to announce on the printed programmes the concerts for the next season, their number, and the name of the leader.

This year the programmes appeared without a word of announcement.

This was in direct contravention of the custom which has been observed for at least ten years.

The inference is that Colonel Higginson, expecting to make a change before next season, preferred to omit the announcement altogether rather than to print one without a leader's name, which would undoubtedly have attracted greater attention.

The annual trip westward will be omitted this spring, also, although the stated cause—the financial depression—may be responsible for this.

Still, a depression does not generally affect such events as the Symphony concerts.

Mr. Paur is generally believed to have come over for a five years' stay. The breaking of contract which his dismissal would mean must be compensated for. Five thousand dollars is understood to be the figure which will be paid him.

This sum will be no inducement to him to leave, however. One who knows him quite well said:

"Leader Paur will stay if he possibly can, and it will be the shattering of all his hopes if he is not directing the Symphony Orchestra next season.

"A matter of $5000 is nothing. To leave his position and return to Europe after one season would mean failure—would have an effect on the minds of the musical world which he can by no possibility afford."

The situation seems to be that Herr Paur wants to stay, Colonel Higginson doesn't want him to stay, and the Symphony admirers generally have preferences for a more magnetic leader.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, was: Funerale, Von Bülow (first time); "Eroica" symphony, Beethoven; two movements from Concerto No. 5, for violin, Mollique, and Tragic overture, Brahms. The soloist was Mr. Otto Roth. The "Funerale" was given in memory of the late Hans von Bülow. It is somewhat more coherent than the other music of his that we have heard, and somewhat less noisy. It is well made, and richly instrumented, and is, of course, in the extreme modern style. It is not especially impressive, and seems vague and on the whole wearisome on a first hearing. It showed its composer's excellent musicianship, but it did not strike us as showing anything more. The Beethoven Symphony received splendid treatment at the hands of Mr. Paur. The nobility of style in which he read it was in refreshing contrast with the spasmodic and quasi-operatic manner in which it had been given by his predecessor. The tempi were just; the pace of the funeral march being notably so. There were few departures from the conservative reading of the work, and there was only an occasional retarding of the time for the more effective emphasizing of a phrase. Taken altogether, it was as masterly and as satisfying an interpretation of the work as it has ever had at these concerts, and was applauded in a spirit of hearty appreciation. The movements of the Mollique concerto are clear, melodious, and have an easy and delightful flow. It is true that they sound a little old-fashioned, but it is a genuine musicianly old fashion. Mr. Roth played them brilliantly, and with irreproachable finish of style. In the matter of fluent and able technique, perfect intonation, phrasing, and grace of expression, nothing was left to wish for. In other respects, there was a lack of virility, but that seems to be a marked characteristic of the violinists of the orchestra who appear as soloists each season. Their playing is always charming in its elegance, its precision and its fluency, but it is curiously similar in its absence of largeness, of vigor and of what is understood as inspiration. In other words, viewed from its technical standpoint it is admirable, but viewed from the standpoint of broad and manly playing, it seems finical, wanting in intellectuality, and displaying the finger-skilled and the bow-clever virtuoso, rather than the solid and earnest musician. It is all very pretty and very interesting, and is creditable to the industry, the ambition, and the talent of the artists, but it never exemplifies such supreme qualities as to do away with the desire to hear a really great violinist, now and then, at these concerts. Mr. Roth, however, acquitted himself tastefully and well and fairly deserved the hearty applause and the recalls that rewarded his efforts. The programme for the next concert is Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. George Riddle is to be the reader, and the choruses will be sung by members of the Cecilia.

IT SEEMS to be difficult for several of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to realize who is in control. They have been so pampered, and have had things their own way, so long, that they have grown into overrating their importance. Hence, when one of them makes it a habit of coming late to rehearsal, and is subjected to a fine, by way of bringing him to a sense of the desirability of punctuality, he is astounded at the daring of the self-reliant conductor who thus disciplines him. Another player, who sinks into his chair, like a musical Mr. Smallweed, and fiddles in a listless manner, as if he were playing under protest and had no interest in his work, whatever, when requested to sit up and put more vigor into his performances, feels insulted to the very depths of his soul, and can scarcely realize that any conductor should be so presuming as to take him to task for not doing his duty properly. Then, there are one or two pretty darlings who are more interested in the graceful motion of their bow-wrist over the top of their large shirt-cuffs than they are in the music they play; and these also feel that they are wronged when they are disciplined, and very properly, into the right course. These people appear to think that the audience assembles to look at and to admire them, rather than to listen to the music. It is very likely, that, by and by, they will, through bitter experience, be brought to a sense of the true state of affairs, and will then concede, though perhaps unwillingly, that the conductor, particularly the able conductor, is, after all, the most important figure in the orchestra, and that when he is resolved to have his own way, it is useless in his subordinates to kick against his authority. In all such cases, when there is any humiliating to be done, it is the rank and file, and not the commanding officer who must suffer it.

Just why Hans von Bülow should have had an elegiac concert in Boston, when that sort of respect was paid neither to Gounod nor Tschalkowsky, does not appear obviously, unless the reason be that he was a German, while neither of them was. Any how a goodly proportion, if not the whole of the audience at last night's Symphony concert must have regretted his death sincerely, because it was the excuse for weighing down their spirits with one of the gloomiest and least interesting programmes which even Mr. Paur's poor judgment in such matters has compounded. It began with a "Funerale" composed by the late lamented, which fortunately was not very long and was rather expressively developed in a Wagnerian fashion from a melancholy theme first propounded by a cheerful choir of bassoons, horns and violas. The treatment of this subject was musicianly and was worked up a couple of times or so to a good deal of sonority and strength. The composer had had the consideration to end its lugubrious minor monody with a few bars in the major mode, but the impression left was still sepulchral. Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony followed—noblest of works in its kind, grand, grave even in its lighter mood, and tinged with sombreness even when it would rejoice and acclaim. A work of works, yet one which should be heard either upon some occasion of solemn state or in relief against the outpourings of altogether other moods. The andante and the opening allegro from Molique's fifth violin concerto came next, but added no positive interest or real life to the hour. The andante is pleasant but pensive, and the other movement makes a good deal of display and tries the players' skill and speed, yet says nothing of consequence and diverts by no positive brilliancy. Mr. Roth played the movements very well, showing a marked gain in composure, smoothness and self-command, manifested through a technique which was quite equal to the demands of the music. Brahms's rather grim and heavy "Tragic" overture brought the concert to a serious conclusion. The orchestra did good service all through the evening both mechanically and in spirit.

The next programme consists solely of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, with the ladies of the Cecilia for vocal assistants, while the usual condensed version of the play will be read by Mr. Riddle, whose success in it has always been eminent.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Von Bulow's Memory Honored by the Symphony Orchestra—Grand German Opera—Varied Musical Happenings.

The program of the 21st symphony concert was given in memory of Hans Guido von Bulow, who died Feb 12 of this year.

One of this eminent composer's latest works was given the place of honor on the program, a "Funerale" in D minor. It is a short and very impressive composition. There is but one movement and a single theme. The latter is itself extremely simple, but is worked out with much elaboration.

In treatment the work is strikingly characteristic of the unique individuality and vigorous, straightforward methods of its composer. It will take high rank with older writings of this character.

The performance by the orchestra was admirable; rarely has a composition received more sympathetic or impressive interpretations.

The other selections consisted of Beethoven's third symphony (Heroic), two movements from Bernhard Molique's concerto No. 5 for violin and orchestra, and Johannes Brahms' tragic overture in D minor. These are all very impressive offerings and thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of the occasion, even if their heaviness and length did prove so severe a tax upon the attention of the audience that many left the hall before the final number was played.

The interpretation of the familiar Beethoven symphony differed materially from that given here by Mr. Paur's predecessors.

and proved considered as a whole, very satisfactory. The simple grandeur, and one might say rugged, character of the music was made more evident than was the custom with former conductors.

Mr. Paur's was probably as faithful a reading of the great master's famous symphony as has ever been given here. There were none of those dainty ornamentations and novel changes of tempo which were so much in favor with Mr. Nikisch.

Mr. Otto Roth added materially to his popularity here by his really brilliant playing of the violin solo in Molique's concerto. He some time ago proved himself entitled to high rank among resident violinists and the evidence shown yesterday of advancement in his art was most gratifying to a large number of friends. His technique seems equal to all requirements, his tones are pure and exact and he plays with uncommon expression and true artistic feeling.

The program of this week's concert will consist of Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mr. George Riddle will read the text and the orchestra will be assisted by a chorus of members of the Cecilia.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The memory of Dr. Hans von Bulow was honored in the programme of last evening's Symphony concert by the performance of his "Funerale" in D minor, the last of a set of four character pieces dedicated by the composer to Hans von Bronsart. The composition consists of a single movement of an uninteresting character, which is, however, elaborately treated in the well-known style of Von Bulow.

The great "Eroica" symphony followed, and the reading given the work by Mr. Paur was thoroughly conservative and equally gratifying. The funeral march was played in a particularly impressive fashion and the finale was read in a way to bring out all its manifold beauties. The audience was greatly pleased with the performance given the symphony, and the work of the men merited all the applause given at its conclusion.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist, making his annual appearance in the concerts on this occasion. He chose for his contribution to the programme the first and second movements from Bernhard's "Moliques," concerto for violin No. 5 in A minor, playing the andante first and following it with the allegro. Mr. Roth has gained something in finish and style since his last appearance in these concerts, and what his playing lacks in strength and character is made up for largely in the purity of his tone and his delicate touch. He is a master of the technique of his instrument, and the many difficulties of the allegro movement were played with an easy grace that quite charmed his audience. He was honored with generous applause at the conclusion of his effort, in which his fellow-musicians joined.

Brahms' tragic overture ended the programme, and Mr. Paur brought to its performance all of his well known admiration for the works of this composer, giving the admirers of "Beethoven's successor" an opportunity to appreciate the finale of the programme to the fullest extent.

Next week's concert will consist of a reading of "Midsummer Night's Dream," with Shakespeare's music, in which the orchestra will have the assistance of the chorus of the Cecilia.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-first symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was in memoriam Hans Guido, Baron von Bulow (born in Dresden Jan. 8, 1830; died in Cairo, Egypt, Feb. 12, 1894.) The programme was as follows:

Hans von Bulow: Funerale, Opus 23, No. 4.

(First time.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), Opus 55.

Molique: Two movements from Concerto for Violin, No. 5, in A minor, Opus 21.

Brahms: Tragic Overture, in D minor, Opus 81.

Mr. Otto Roth was the violinist.

An in memoriam programme is seldom an easy one to make up, especially when the person to be honored has made little or no mark as a composer. All sorts of conflicting elements have to be reconciled, as best they may. That each selection should have a certain appositeness to the occasion, goes without saying; it is also desirable that the programme itself should be a fine one, its component numbers going well together, both in the way of similarity of purpose and of artistic contrast. The problem is no easy one; unfortunately it is too often made harder than necessary by the half-hearted way it is faced. A third element is generally introduced: that of easy practicableness; the great departed musician is to be honored, to be sure, but at the expense of as little trouble as possible, and without lifting the orchestra too much out of its every-day ruts. It is rather like the tribute of respect paid to deceased notabilities by sending the empty family coach to their funerals—a piece of etiquette that does not represent much real pains-taking. We have had this sort of in memoriam concert in Boston before. Not very long ago we "honored" Sebastian Bach, not by giving a fine and carefully prepared performance of any important, hitherto unheard work of his, but by simply turning our Bach-barrel upside down, and fishing out a few old things that could be done with a minimum of trouble.

On last Saturday's programme there was a new work by Von Bulow himself—probably the first orchestral piece of his ever heard in this city. So far, good! The "Eroica" symphony and the Tragic Overture were also unquestionably apposite; so far, still good! A little open to the suspicion of monotony, perhaps, but on occasions of this sort this is easily pardonable. But, in the name of common decency, what had the movements from Molique's concerto to do or say on such a programme? What possible connection can there be between an obsolete musical pink-of-propriety like Molique and the militant Von Bulow, whose whole artistic life was an unintermitting energetic protest against all that men of Molique's stamp represented in music? Von Bulow may be said to have indicated his own in memoriam programme with tolerable distinctness, if ever a musician did. "My musical creed is in E-flat major—with three B's (flats) to the signature: Bach, Beethoven and Brahms!" We had the Beethoven and the Brahms; for which all thanks. But where was the Bach?—the first on the list! Conspicuous only by his absence! Or was Molique, a respectable gentleman who had made his studies in counterpoint as well as another, to rattle round in the great John Sebastian's shoes and stand proxy for him? We suspect that here the element of "easy practicableness" came in; that Mr. Roth had long been down on the list for a concerto, that the in memoriam Von Bulow programme was an after-thought, and that, having already made out the three remaining programmes of the season, Mr. Paur did not see his way clear to lodging Mr. Roth and his concerto anywhere else. And let it be said furthermore that, if the Molique concerto showed no honor to Von Bulow, its position on the programme showed no favor whatever to Mr. Roth. To ask a solo player to face an audience after nearly an hour and a half of pretty solid music, is to show him no kindness; but to expect him to thrill an audience with a poor, attenuated little salon-concerto like Molique's immediately after the "Eroica" symphony—that is to put him into about as anomalous a position as any artist could desire to escape from. Just after the uneasy chromatics and nightmare oppression of the Von Bulow Funerale, the unassuming clearness of style and rather simpering daintiness of the two Molique movements might have been really grateful; but Beethoven's "Eroica" killed it outright.

Von Bulow's Funerale is a piece of free writing, in which one catches a glimpse of more than one Wagnerish-sounding phrase. It seems to us quite as good as a great deal of the music that passes muster nowadays; it is only its disproportion with the greatness of Von Bulow's name that makes it seem something of a pity to rake it up out of oblivion and expose it to public hearing. The "Eroica" was played with great spirit, and with excellently well-chosen tempi; the performance, however, was not throughout impeccable in point of finish. Brahms's grand Tragic Overture was very well played indeed, and made a superb effect.

Mr. Roth played the Molique concerto very beautifully indeed, with exquisite sentiment in the cantilena passages, fine warmth of tone, grace of phrasing, and brilliancy of bravura. The composition itself we have already spoken of; it is dead past resuscitation. We have a suspicion, too, that the style of violin-playing which belonged to it in its day is also obsolete now. We have heard some of the older generation of violinists, now passing or passed away, speak with regret of the decay of the old "grand style" of solo playing which they remembered hearing in their youth. The late Julius Eichberg, for instance, would now and then go into descriptive details on the subject; his account tallied very well with other plausible historical evidence. These to us flimsy little concertos, especially the broader cantilena passages, were played with a grandiosity of dramatic expression that would probably raise a smile today; the same thing was true of the older English ballad-singing, by men like Incedon and Braham; simple little songs like the Dibdin ballads were sung in a portentously dramatic style that would have befitted the most strenuous passages in grand opera. Ole Bull's violin-playing was one of the last remnants of the old style,—exaggerated, to be sure, and pushed to extremes. No doubt it would be a ticklish experiment to try this sort of thing before a serious audience today; people would be pretty sure to laugh at it. Still we should not forget that things like this concerto of Molique's were probably conceived in this vein, and that it was this sort of playing that made them effective in the ears of audiences in the heyday of their popularity.

The next programme is Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," with a chorus from the Cecilia and Mr. George Riddle as reader of the text.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

To illustrate the peculiar deftness in the art of programme-making which has ruled recently in our symphony concerts, it may be mentioned that there were two funeral marches on the list on Saturday, the soloist came on at a quarter past nine, and a tragic overture made a dark ending to the matter at about 10 P.M. But everything in this long and ill-assorted programme was played to perfection, and there was certainly an excuse for the gloom of much of the music in the fact that the occasion was a tribute to the memory of the recently deceased Von Bulow.

To give a concert in memory of this great worker in music could not have been a very easy task, for Bulow was at his very weakest as a composer; to celebrate the memory of Tschaiikowsky or even of Gounod would have been infinitely easier. One work only by the defunct was upon the programme, and this was by far the least interesting number of the evening. The "Funerale," which was the work in question, was a good study in scoring and in musical arithmetic, but its name was not to be whispered in the same breath with what Beethoven, Wagner or Chopin have done in the same direction.

It was immediately obliterated by Beethoven's Heroic symphony, which received an interpretation that has not been surpassed in this city. There was a little of over-precision in the first movement, but this was a failing that leaned to virtue's side. The Funeral March was given with just the right sentiment, being neither too inflated on the one hand, nor too lachrymose on the other. Coleridge once spoke of this as "a funeral march in purple," and the note of dignity which this implies was present from first to last. The oboe did especially excellent work in this movement, and the great orchestral sob with which the movement ends was perfectly portrayed.

The scherzo was taken with just the right spirit also; it is really the first symphonic scherzo ever written, for in the scherzo of the second symphony (the first establishment of this kind of movement) the composer has kept very close to the minuet in form, style and tempo, and it is more of a minuet than the minuet of the first symphony. Berlioz's idea that it pictures the world going on, chattering bargaining, and enjoying itself, even after the death of the hero, may not be so far from the truth, but he who listens carefully will not fail to hear something of the clash of swords, an echo of heroism, even in its jovial measures. The horn trio of this movement is not so difficult now, when the players give everything on F horns with ventils, as it was in the composer's time, when it was performed on three E-flat horns. It was very well played and the charming modulation in which D-flat is suddenly introduced was most clear and effective in performance. The finale always seems to the reviewer the beginning of the struggle of Beethoven to produce a good counterpoise to the power of the first-movement-form, a struggle continued in the fifth symphony and culminated in the ninth. It has always been a defect in the sonata-form (of which the symphony is the highest expression) that the trump card is played first, that the beginning with the finest form known to modern music makes the finale either a copy or an anti-climax. It seems odd, too, that Beethoven did not venture on trombones, the military instruments for heavy work, in this symphony, (they first came into symphony in the finale of the fifth symphony) and as he never made much of the trumpets (there is not a very difficult trumpet passage in all Beethoven's scores) the military tone-color is not very prominent. The finale was splendidly performed, and one may congratulate Boston on once more hearing Beethoven's works as he intended them, without extra spice or sensationalism.

Mr. Otto Roth was the soloist and played two movements of Molique's fifth concerto for violin with excellent expression and technique. His tone is broader, his style more masculine than it used to be, and he made more out of the sweet and rather cloying work than one would have expected. Many recalls greeted the end of his performance, and the enthusiasm was fully earned. The work itself, however, scarcely seems worthy of being ranked with the true concertos; compared with Mendelssohn's or any of Bruch's (to compare it with Beethoven's would be sacrilege), it seems rather a violin solo with orchestral accompaniment than an interweaving of the two forces, an orchestral work with a solo thread woven into the fabric, as the concerto should be and as the works cited are. Yet it is rich in melody, and even in these days of musical "impressionists" a set of tuneful themes is sure to win appreciation.

More laudatory adjectives must be showered upon the Tragic overture by Brahms. It had a smaller audience than its predecessors, for many had departed when it began. Its gloom was of a different type from that of the first two numbers; it is full of foreboding, of weird and mystic brooding; it suggests Ossian as strongly as Mendelssohn, and more strongly than Gade has done. Its interpretation only heightened the conviction that we are gaining ground steadily in the standard of our orchestral work, all that was lost has been recovered and the future promises even more.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XXII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 14, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MENDELSSOHN.

OVERTURE, op. 21, and INCIDENTAL MUSIC, op. 61, to SHAKSPERE'S "MIDSUMMER-NIGHT'S DREAM."

- I. OVERTURE: Allegro di molto.
- II. SCHERZO. (After Act I.): Allegro vivace.
- III. MELODRAMA. (Act II. Scenes 1 and 2): Allegro Vivace.
- IV. SONG with CHORUS. ("You spotted snakes." Act II. Scene 3): Allegro ma non troppo.
- V. MELODRAMA. (Act II. Scene 3): Andante.
- VI. ENTR'ACTE. (After Act II.): Allegro appassionato.—Allegro molto commodo.
- VII. MELODRAMA. (Act III. Scene 1.): Allegro.
- VIII. NOCTURNE. (After Act III.): Andante tranquillo.
- IX. MELODRAMA. (Act IV. Scene 1): Andante.—Allegro molto.
- X. WEDDING MARCH. (After Act IV.): Allegro vivace.
- XI. MELODRAMA. (Act V. Scene 1): Allegro commodo.
MARCIA FUNEBRE: Andante commodo.
- XII. DANCE OF CLOWNS. (Act V. Scene 1.): Allegro di molto.
- XIII. MARCH. (After Act V. Scene 1.): Allegro vivace.
- XIV. FINALE; CHORUS OF ELVES. ("Through the house give glimmering light. Act V. Scene 2.): Allegro di molto.

Reader: Mr. GEORGE RIDDLE.

Soloists:

MRS. MARIE BARNARD SMITH.

MISS HARRIET S. WHITTIER.

Chorus of Members of the Cecilia.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

J. W. D.

Mendelssohn's Midsummer Night's Dream.

GEORGE RIDDLE READS.

An Interesting, Well Planned Programme.

The Director Paur Story—Notes of Interest in the Music World.

The overture and incidental music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer-Night's Dream," by Mendelssohn, with readings from the play by Mr. George Riddle, furnished the programme for the 22nd concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday evening.

Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier and members of the Cecilia assisted in the performance.

The delicate and graceful music of Mendelssohn written to Shakespeare's play is of phenomenal freshness and beauty and aptly dramatic in its fairy and rustic elements, as well, breathing as it does a most refined conception upon the part of its author. The invention shown in this work is of extraordinary fertility, the instrumentation being masterly in its treatment and delicacy.

Of this stroke of genius, to quote freely, it can be said that age cannot wither it, nor custom stale its infinite variety and beauty.

For the performance Saturday evening, nothing but praise can be accorded. Mr. Paur conducted the work with rare ability. His tempo of the Wedding March is to be commended for its moderate pace, the effect thereby being wonderfully grand and impressive. The audience recalled him several times after the playing of this number. The fairy lightness of the Scherzo was entrancing. The beautiful nocturne was played delightfully. Mr. Paur imparting to it the true spirit of tranquility.

The horn solo in this number was played by Mr. Hackenbarth, the first horn of the orchestra, in a most exquisite and highly artistic manner, his tone quality being of the most mellow character and accurately true in intonation.

Mr. Paur should prize this able and artistic performer. I am sure all the critical listeners bless the good fortune that brought this artistic player to our orchestra to sustain in so superior a manner the first horn part with all its difficulties.

Mr. Riddle was eminently successful in his readings, the audience recognizing the brilliancy of the effort and the individuality and dramatic delineation of the various characters of the play with frequent and hearty applause. In gaining his effects in the defining of the characters of the play Mr. Riddle did not spare his vocal apparatus, and the singer, actor or elocutionist that was among the listeners must have rejoiced that it was not his own throat that was being rasped so violently at times. Next Saturday evening will embrace the following numbers: Symphony, No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; Prelude to "Edipus," J. K. Paine; Overture to "King Stephen," Beethoven. Miss Antoinette Trebelli will sing an aria from "Don Juan," Mozart; and one from Massenet's "Le Cid."

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

September 29, 1862, Samuel Pepys wrote "To the King's Theatre where we saw 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' which I had never seen before, nor shall ever again, for it is the most insipid, ridiculous play that ever I saw in my life." While no auditor at Saturday's symphony concert (or possibly "musical entertainment" would be a truer expression) could share Pepys' views, not a few must have been astonished to find a play in the foreground, and the orchestra in the background. Yet the reading of almost the whole of the Shakespearian play gave opportunity to judge of the fitness of Mendelssohn's incidental music, an opportunity which would not have been obtained had not the reader been present to give the poet's context. The chief precept for such a performance, in which the literary overbalanced the musical, is to be found in Schumann's "Manfred" which has frequently been given in our classical concerts; but here two points of distinction may be drawn—"Manfred" is not a light comedy, but a most exalted tragedy, in it the text does not preponderate greatly over the music, and Schumann has written some of the most beautiful melodrama (the union of music with declamation) for the Byronic poem that ever was created, while Mendelssohn wrote the incidental music to the Shakespearian play to order, and with two exceptions, did not attempt enough to bring the work from the theatre into the concert room. The audience was evidently deeply interested, as was evinced not only by the applause but by the overwhelming rustle of the programme books when the reader passed from one page to the next.

Mr. George Riddle was the reader and showed great intelligence and marvellous elocutionary power in his work. One might object to the exaggeration of the character of Bottom, and especially to the introduction of burlesque singing on the symphonic stage, but this comment falls outside of the domain of musical criticism, and the shoemaker has no desire to be invited to stick to his last.

The musical portion of the work was admirably done. The overture is one of the finest specimens of humor in music that exists. It is a mistake to suppose that the great masters stalked about with their heads in the clouds, or were forever scaling Olympus; all of them have shown a tendency to do some work on the playful side, and not one of the great composers has gone solemnly through his career carrying a top-heavy dignity. Beethoven's drunken bassoonist in his sixth symphony, Mozart's ribald canons, show the coarse side of musical humor, Bach's "Coffee Cantata," the duller expression of it, but of all the composers at play none have achieved such fun without either vulgarity or clumsiness, such heartiness without coarseness as Mendelssohn, and the scherzo in the Scotch Symphony, or the overture to "Midsummer Night's Dream" are splendid examples of his power in this direction. In the midst of all the fun the symmetrical form is preserved, and if the drunken weaver snores during his slumber in fairyland, it is as a bass to the recapitulation of the chief theme that he does so. This same snoring, however, has lost some of its effect through the obsolescence of the Ophicleide. The raucous tone of this instrument, for which Mendelssohn wrote the part, is scarcely replaced by the smoother sound of the bass tuba which substitutes for it at present. The braying of the bassoon, allusive to the metamorphosis of Bottom, is fortunately still given as Mendelssohn wrote it. The coda seemed taken rather slow, and the woodwind did not bend as perfectly as usual, but beyond this everything was delightfully performed. The overture antedates the rest of the music by 17 years, and it is not too much to say that it is the most finished and satisfactory composition ever brought forth by a youth in his teens; only Schubert, who at the same age brought forth the "Erl-king," may be compared with Mendelssohn in this early ripeness.

The scherzo of the incidental music is not as spontaneous as the overture, there is less of abandon in the hard-worked man than in the enthusiastic boy. In the melodrama Mendelssohn falls far below Schumann, every portion of this seems perfunctory except those parts which he has taken from his own overture (a musical robbery of Peter to pay Paul) and a short passage for strings near the end of the play, but one can heartily compliment the performers, and the reader kept most admirably with the music, a species of timekeeping far more difficult than that achieved by the singer.

"You Spotted Snakes" was most daintily sung, Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith giving her solo both in this and later in the comedy with most careful effect and pleasant voice. Miss Harriet S. Whittier also sang with good taste, and the shading of the chorus, composed of members of the Cecilia, showed that the female branch of that worthy society still maintains its high standard of efficiency. Yet Stevens' setting of "You Spotted Snakes" is much stronger than this version by Mendelssohn. Titania's remark which ushers in this number, "Come now, a roundel and a fairy song" is notable as being Shakespeare's chief allusion to round-singing, which was popular enough in England in his time; per contra, he alludes frequently enough to catches, the tavern music of his day, in which I suspect he often sustained his part. The two chief points of the incidental music, which Mendelssohn wrote at the royal command, are the Nocturne and the Wedding March. The Nocturne was exquisitely shaded and the horn work was without a blemish. The Wedding March was taken with a dignity which is seldom accorded it and the fanfares rang out with amazing power and clearness. The applause which greeted this and the Nocturne showed that the audience appreciated the music none the less because of its declamatory adjuncts. Altogether, although "symphony concert" would be a misnomer for the proceedings, the occasion was not without its educational value, and it was well at least once to hear a celebrated work of that master whom the present age has somewhat slighted, and to hear it with its literary context.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

"Midsummer Night's Dream" at the Symphony—Carl Zerrahn's Testimonial—Music Notes.

Mendelssohn's beautiful musical setting to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," with the choruses given by the Cecilia club, portions of the text read by Mr. George Riddle, and the solos sung by Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet Whittier, made up last week's symphony program. This was the first performance here of the entire composition since 1891 when it was performed at the Boston theater by the Philharmonic orchestra under the direction of Bernhard Listemann, Mr. Riddle appearing as the reader.

The Cecilia club sang the choruses very daintily, and the soloists, Mrs. Smith and Miss Whittier, performed their work quite effectively. Their voices harmonized well, but were lacking in the power necessary for singing with so large an instrumental contingent.

The text was admirably read by Mr. Riddle. The comical scenes in which the "hard-handed men of Athens" are introduced, were specially commendable, the reader individualizing the various characters perfectly, and bringing out the humor of the lines with most laughable results. The scenes requiring the simulation of female voices were less successful, the falsetto tones of a man not being particularly pleasing to the ear. The sentiments were skilfully presented, though, and Mr. Riddle's intelligent reading and thorough conception of the text clearly demonstrated his right to rank with the foremost in his class of entertainers.

The orchestra played the overture with commendable spirit, and, excepting a roughness in the brasses, the interpretation was excellent in every way. The "Wedding March" made the greatest impression, perhaps, because of its familiarity to the majority of the audience. It was magnificently given, the brasses redeeming themselves by a rich tonality and precision of phrasing, and the long applause at the close brought conductor Paur to the front of the platform several times to bow his acknowledgments.

Throughout the 14 numbers the perfect unanimity of the strings was notably in evidence. The fairy music, with its wonderful lights and shades, was as trippingly and delicately given as one could wish, the finale chorus of elves being one of the gems of the performance.

The audience kept up a rustling of program leaves in following the text, and although the "Dream" is a forest idyl, this "realism" was very unpleasant and annoying at times to the reader.

The program this week will be as follows: Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; prelude to "Edipus," Paine; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; overture to "King Stephen," Beethoven. Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli will be the solo singer.

april 15. MUSIC. Gazette 1894

Paur and the Prophets.

The Musical Courier, of New York, continues to be greatly disturbed about Mr. Paur; why, it is not exactly easy to understand. It is true that we have heard something about the Courier making an application to Mr. Paur to put his portrait on the front page of that weekly, and of Mr. Paur's neglect to comply with the suggestion, which was doubtless delicately and thoughtfully made; but this, of course, could not have had any effect in influencing the course of the Courier toward him, for, as we all know, that paper enjoys a flattering celebrity for its fairness and its incorruptibility. To suspect it of enmity to Mr. Paur because he declines to respond favorably to the request for his portrait, and is not open to conviction that it is worth while to pay for its insertion in the Courier would be to do an injustice to a periodical whose uprightness, whose horror of anything resembling the levying of blackmail on artists, and whose reputation for all that is fair, straightforward and honorable, are notorious, if we may use that word in a complimentary sense.

No, it is clear that the Courier is impartial in its hostility to Mr. Paur, and is moved only by its loyalty to art as it understands the matter. What perplexes us, however, is why the Courier is adverse to Mr. Paur, when all the reputable Boston music critics write favorably of him. The Courier says absolutely and imperiously, "Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted;" but it does not tell us why he will not do; and by whom he is not wanted. At this distance from the office of the Courier, it seems that Mr. Paur will do, and we have heard nothing about his not being wanted, except through that paper. Perhaps, if it gave its authority, we should learn that the information so positively sent forth has been derived from some few disgruntled first violinists, who have been disciplined by Mr. Paur, and are resentful in consequence. With all our profound admiration for the honesty and the infallibility of the Courier, we are puzzled to understand what it means when it says that "Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second rate conductor." What does it know practically of him as an artist, and in what is he a second rate conductor? In this benighted spot, it appears that Mr. Paur is the very best conductor that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had; that he has retrieved the orchestra from the sloppy demoralization into which it fell under the sway of Mr. Nikisch, and has brought it to even a higher state of efficiency, as far as spirit is concerned, than it maintained under Mr. Gericke. The Courier, however, does not seem to be aware of this fact, for it says, "Mr. Paur does not begin to fill the boots of Mr. Nikisch." Why should he begin to fill them? He was not engaged to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, nor to rival Mr. Nikisch's shirt cuffs. Mr. Nikisch did not fill his own boots, as a conductor of symphony concerts. They were much too large for him. If there is a cause for congratulation in the replacing of Mr. Nikisch by Mr. Paur, it is that the latter has nothing in common with the former, and that there is not a trace of the pretender, the humbug, or the poseur in him. It may be true that he does not visit the office of the Courier when he is in New York, and hob nob with the editors as did Mr. Nikisch; but then he may not have seen the advisability of doing so, and may also have certain views regarding personal dignity, to say nothing of his ignorance of the vital importance of the Courier as a disinterested supporter of musical art in this country, especially in Boston. Under these circumstances, it was somewhat premature in its reference to the size of Mr. Nikisch's boots, owing to its lack of opportunity to inspect Mr. Paur's boots on its own premises. We must, however, charge the Courier with a few misstatements, not intentionally made, for we are aware that it is so rigid a follower of truth, that we do not hesitate to believe that it will blush for remorse when we have pointed out the errors into which it has fallen,—inadvertently, of course. It says that because Mr. Paur does not begin to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, "the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts." The public has done nothing of the kind, and the attendance at the concerts has been quite as large as it was under the gentleman whose boots assume such crucial importance in the eyes of the Courier. Another mistake is the statement, "The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality;" whereas, the truth is that they were abandoned because of the discouraging financial condition at present prevailing through the country, and in the face of which it was considered imprudent to go to the expense of transporting a large orchestra from place to place, under unfavorable circumstances. Then, too, as the South and West know nothing of Mr. Paur, and whether he does or does not lack personality or popularity, it is difficult to see the exact grounds on which our contemporary makes this remarkable statement. The climax of the Courier's polite, amicable and disinterested view of the case is reached in the following words: "Mr. Paur is a failure; a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words? Mr. Paur must go!" Ah, why juggle? Mr. Paur must go! He does not begin to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, and is an artistic failure; but, leaving these occult boots entirely out of the question, Mr. Paur is an artistic success. We are afraid that the Courier indulges unconsciously in the very word juggling that it inferentially condemns. It is the boots about which all the argument revolves. The paltriness, the vindictiveness and the small malice that characterize these systematic and unprovoked attacks on Mr. Paur, would seem to suggest that he wears boots of his own, for which he might find vigorous and justifiable employment by way of showing his appreciation of some of the attentions that have been paid him in New York. In the meanwhile, Mr. Paur does not go. It is true that the Courier says that he "must go," but, as we have already hinted, he is not fully aware of the influential character of the Courier, and blindly, perhaps over-daringly, plays with fire, in remaining here under the terms of his contract. We, however, have such faith in the infallibility of the Courier that we cannot believe it to be capable of a mistake in this matter. "Mr. Paur must go?" Ah! we have it. The Courier juggles with words. It means he must go at the end of his five years' contract, or at the end of ten years if the contract is renewed. There you are! Our faith in the Courier, as a prophet and a power, is justified.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, consisted of Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mr. George Riddle reading the poem, and members of the Cecilia rendering the solos and choruses. The music is still fascinating, fresh and interesting, even the overture, hackneyed as it is, retaining all of its original power to charm. Mr. Paur read the score from beginning to end in a delightfully sympathetic manner, and with a fine appreciation of its prevailing delicacy and purity of taste and style. The work of the orchestra was perfect, and its admirable discipline was notably exemplified in the clearness and precision with which the scherzo was given, and in the warmth and grace that marked its playing of the nocturne. Mr. Riddle's reading was not only beautiful from an elocutionary standpoint, but was also brilliant in the skill with which he individualized the various characters and entered into the spirit of the text. The audience, which was a large one, evidenced the pleasure that the performers gave it throughout, by the heartiness and the frequency of its applause. Nothing was lacking to make the entertainment one to be wholly enjoyed. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, E minor, Brahms; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; Prelude to "Edipus," J. K. Paine; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli.

For the first time since its constitution, the Symphony orchestra has given the whole of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, which composed—with the usual condensed version of the play—the whole of last night's concert. The orchestra is at last in just the right condition to play the delicate fairy music, the broad and gruff and yet modest humorous illustrations to the clown-comedy, the fantastic overture, the light-some scherzo, the tranquil nocturne and the resplendent wedding-march, each in its proper mood and with its proper touch. Exactitude has come back to the strings, definiteness of attack to the wind choirs and obedience to the whole body of men, so that the conductor's desires are promptly and truly expressed, scarcely less to the credit of the executants than to his own. The entire performance was a delightful one for unity of rendering and for perfection of taste in the numbers of graceful beauty. There were decision and fulness when required, and the wedding march was superb in its splendid rhythmic emphasis, its resonant purity of tone and its remarkable enthusiasm. The small and few vocal numbers were well contributed by the ladies of the Cecilia, the brief, light solo passages being gracefully rendered by Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier.

The reader of the text was Mr. George Riddle, who stands facile princeps in it. There may be hidden away somewhere in the land another

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

"Midsummer Night's Dream" at the Symphony—Carl Zerrahn's Testimonial—Music Notes.

Mendelssohn's beautiful musical setting to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," with the choruses given by the Cecilia club, portions of the text read by Mr George Riddle, and the solos sung by Mrs Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet Whittier, made up last week's symphony program. This was the first performance here of the entire composition since 1891 when it was performed at the Boston theater by the Philharmonic orchestra under the direction of Bernhard Listemann, Mr Riddle appearing as the reader.

The Cecilia club sang the choruses very daintily, and the soloists, Mrs Smith and Miss Whittier, performed their work quite effectively. Their voices harmonized well, but were lacking in the power necessary for singing with so large an instrumental contingent.

The text was admirably read by Mr Riddle. The comical scenes in which the "hard-handed men of Athens" are introduced, were specially commendable, the reader individualizing the various characters perfectly, and bringing out the humor of the lines with most laughable results. The scenes requiring the simulation of female voices were less successful, the falsetto tones of a man not being particularly pleasing to the ear. The sentiments were skilfully presented, though, and Mr Riddle's intelligent reading and thorough conception of the text clearly demonstrated his right to rank with the foremost in his class of entertainers.

The orchestra played the overture with commendable spirit, and, excepting a roughness in the brasses, the interpretation was excellent in every way. The "Wedding March" made the greatest impression, perhaps, because of its familiarity to the majority of the audience. It was magnificently given, the brasses redeeming themselves by a rich tonality and precision of phrasing, and the long applause at the close brought conductor Paur to the front of the platform several times to bow his acknowledgments.

Throughout the 14 numbers the perfect unanimity of the strings was notably in evidence. The fairy music, with its wonderful lights and shades, was as trippingly and delicately given as one could wish, the finale chorus of elves being one of the gems of the performance.

The audience kept up a rustling of program leaves in following the text, and although the "Dream" is a forest idyl this "realism" was very unpleasant and annoying at times to the reader.

The program this week will be as follows: Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Brahms; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; prelude to "Oedipus," Paine; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; overture to "King Stephen," Beethoven. Mlle Antoinette Trebelli will be the solo singer.

april 15. MUSIC. Gazette 1894

Paur and the Prophets.

The Musical Courier, of New York, continues to be greatly disturbed about Mr. Paur; why, it is not exactly easy to understand. It is true that we have heard something about the Courier making an application to Mr. Paur to put his portrait on the front page of that weekly, and of Mr. Paur's neglect to comply with the suggestion, which was doubtless delicately and thoughtfully made; but this, of course, could not have had any effect in influencing the course of the Courier toward him, for, as we all know, that paper enjoys a flattering celebrity for its fairness and its incorruptibility. To suspect it of enmity to Mr. Paur because he declines to respond favorably to the request for his portrait, and is not open to conviction that it is worth while to pay for its insertion in the Courier would be to do an injustice to a periodical whose uprightness, whose horror of anything resembling the levying of blackmail on artists, and whose reputation for all that is fair, straightforward and honorable, are notorious, if we may use that word in a complimentary sense.

No, it is clear that the Courier is impartial in its hostility to Mr. Paur, and is moved only by its loyalty to art as it understands the matter. What perplexes us, however, is why the Courier is adverse to Mr. Paur, when all the reputable Boston music critics write favorably of him. The Courier says absolutely and imperiously, "Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted;" but it does not tell us why he will not do; and by whom he is not wanted. At this distance from the office of the Courier, it seems that Mr. Paur will do, and we have heard nothing about his not being wanted, except through that paper. Perhaps, if it gave its authority, we should learn that the information so positively sent forth has been derived from some few disgruntled first violinists, who have been disciplined by Mr. Paur, and are resentful in consequence. With all our profound admiration for the honesty and the infallibility of the Courier, we are puzzled to understand what it means when it says that "Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second rate conductor." What does it know practically of him as an artist, and in what is he a second rate conductor? In this benighted spot, it appears that Mr. Paur is the very best conductor that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had; that he has retrieved the orchestra from the sloppy demoralization into which it fell under the sway of Mr. Nikisch, and has brought it to even a higher state of efficiency, as far as spirit is concerned, than it maintained under Mr. Gerlicke. The Courier, however, does not seem to be aware of this fact, for it says, "Mr. Paur does not begin to fill the boots of Mr. Nikisch." Why should he begin to fill them? He was not engaged to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, nor to rival Mr. Nikisch's shirt cuffs. Mr. Nikisch did not fill his own boots, as a conductor of symphony concerts. They were much too large for him. If there is a cause for congratulation in the replacing of Mr. Nikisch by Mr. Paur, it is that the latter has nothing in common with the former, and that there is not a trace of the pretender, the humbug, or the poseur in him. It may be true that he does not visit the office of the Courier when he is in New York, and hob nob with the editors as did Mr. Nikisch; but then he may not have seen the advisability of doing so, and may also have certain views regarding personal dignity, to say nothing of his ignorance of the vital importance of the Courier as a disinterested supporter of musical art in this country, especially in Boston. Under these circumstances, it was somewhat premature in its reference to the size of Mr. Nikisch's boots, owing to its lack of opportunity to inspect Mr. Paur's boots on its own premises. We must, however, charge the Courier with a few misstatements, not intentionally made, for we are aware that it is so rigid a follower of truth, that we do not hesitate to believe that it will blush for remorse when we have pointed out the errors into which it has fallen,—inadvertently, of course. It says that because Mr. Paur does not begin to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, "the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts." The public has done nothing of the kind, and the attendance at the concerts has been quite as large as it was under the gentleman whose boots assume such crucial importance in the eyes of the Courier. Another mistake is the statement, "The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality;" whereas, the truth is that they were abandoned because of the discouraging financial condition at present prevailing through the country, and in the face of which it was considered imprudent to go to the expense of transporting a large orchestra from place to place, under unfavorable circumstances. Then, too, as the South and West know nothing of Mr. Paur, and whether he does or does not lack personality or popularity, it is difficult to see the exact grounds on which our contemporary makes this remarkable statement. The climax of the Courier's polite, amicable and disinterested view of the case is reached in the following words: "Mr. Paur is a failure; a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words? Mr. Paur must go!" Ah, why juggle? Mr. Paur must go! He does not begin to fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, and is an artistic failure; but, leaving these occult boots entirely out of the question, Mr. Paur is an artistic success. We are afraid that the Courier indulges unconsciously in the very word juggling that it inferentially condemns. It is the boots about which all the argument revolves. The paltriness, the vacillateness and the small malice that characterize these systematic and unprovoked attacks on Mr. Paur, would seem to suggest that he wears boots of his own, for which he might find vigorous and justifiable employment by way of showing his appreciation of some of the attentions that have been paid him in New York. In the meanwhile, Mr. Paur does not go. It is true that the Courier says that he "must go," but, as we have already hinted, he is not fully aware of the influential character of the Courier, and blindly, perhaps over-daringly, plays with fire, in remaining here under the terms of his contract. We, however, have such faith in the infallibility of the Courier that we cannot believe it to be capable of a mistake in this matter. "Mr. Paur must go?" Ah! we have it. The Courier juggles with words. It means he must go at the end of his five years' contract, or at the end of ten years if the contract is renewed. There you are! Our faith in the Courier, as a prophet and a power, is justified.

The Symphony Concert. Gazette

The programme of last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, consisted of Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," Mr. George Riddle reading the poem, and members of the Cecilia rendering the solos and choruses. The music is still fascinating, fresh and interesting, even the overture, hackneyed as it is, retaining all of its original power to charm. Mr. Paur read the score from beginning to end in a delightfully sympathetic manner, and with a fine appreciation of its prevailing delicacy and purity of taste and style. The work of the orchestra was perfect, and its admirable discipline was notably exemplified in the clearness and precision with which the scherzo was given, and in the warmth and grace that marked its playing of the nocturne. Mr. Riddle's reading was not only beautiful from an elocutionary standpoint, but was also brilliant in the skill with which he individualized the various characters and entered into the spirit of the text. The audience, which was a large one, evidenced the pleasure that the performers gave it throughout, by the heartiness and the frequency of its applause. Nothing was lacking to make the entertainment one to be wholly enjoyed. The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 4, E-minor, Brahms; aria from "Don Giovanni," Mozart; Prelude to "Oedipus," J. K. Paine; aria from "Le Cid," Massenet; overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven. The soloist is to be Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli.

For the first time since its constitution, the Symphony orchestra has given the whole of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, which composed—with the usual condensed version of the play—the whole of last night's concert. The orchestra is at last in just the right condition to play the delicate fairy music, the broad and gruff and yet modest humorous illustrations to the clown-comedy, the fantastic overture, the light-some scherzo, the tranquil nocturne and the resplendent wedding-march, each in its proper mood and with its proper touch. Exactitude has come back to the strings, definiteness of attack to the wind choirs and obedience to the whole body of men, so that the conductor's desires are promptly and truly expressed, scarcely less to the credit of the executants than to his own. The entire performance was a delightful one for unity of rendering and for perfection of taste in the numbers of graceful beauty. There were decision and fulness when required, and the wedding march was superb in its splendid rhythmic emphasis, its resonant purity of tone and its remarkable enthusiasm. The small and few vocal numbers were well contributed by the ladies of the Cecilia, the brief, light solo passages being gracefully rendered by Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier.

The reader of the text was Mr. George Riddle, who stands facile princeps in it. There may be hidden away somewhere in the land another reader, woman or man, who might safely challenge comparison with him in this most difficult task; but we know of none such. He has a peculiar natural fitness in the melodious tone and extended compass of his voice, to whose sweet, fine, high and suave qualities his art has added depth, strength and upon occasion a ruggedness which at first seems quite unreconcilable with those other elements as the product of one and the same organ. He is alike happy in the fanciful airy voicings of Puck and the spirits, the femininity of Helena and Hermia, and in the rough, strident outcries of Bottom. More than this, his musical disposition is sensitive and he follows with harmonious sympathy the course of each passage of melodrama. Were we to make a criticism, it would be that in sentimental dialogue he seems less sincere and plastic than in the energetic or humorous; but to urge this might seem like cavilling, and would certainly be unnecessary. Of course, it hardly needs to be added that his diction is elegant, his attention to even minor points of emphasis true, his regard to rhythm invariable and his phrasing scholarly.

266

Next Saturday's programme gives the orchestra Brahms's fourth symphony, the prelude to Professor Paine's "Edipus" and Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture. The soloist will be Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli, daughter of the famous contralto. She has but recently arrived in this country, and she chooses for this occasion arias from "Don Giovanni" and Massenet's "Le Cid."

The New York Musical Courier continues its malleous and ignorant talk about the conductorship of the Boston orchestra in two more despicable and misleading paragraphs. What its object can be in thus malignantly attacking Mr. Paur and insolently assuming to speak for Mr. Higginson, is beyond even guessing. The only possible explanation or excuse is that it has gone mad with chagrin because its desire to recommend some unsuitable nominee of its own, for the position was passed over with silent contempt. If the Courier told truths, one would not mind its violent language and its ridiculous dictatorial tone. But there may be people in obscure places who will believe in its diatribes just because of their clamorous and confident manner, and it is therefore a pity that some pages out of its own history cannot be reprinted as a warning to those who may imagine that it is always honest and impartial and that it has never had to make mortifying retractions.

Howard MALCOM TICKNOR.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last evening's concert at Music Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra included Mendelssohn's music for Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The connecting dialogue was read by Mr. George Riddle and the vocal numbers were given with the assistance of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Harriet S. Whittier, and a chorus of the Cecilia singers.

Mr. Paur's reading of the overture was a most fascinating one, and all of the instrumental music was given an interpretation of the most pleasing sort. The graceful scherzo, the wedding march and the other more familiar concert pieces were delightfully played, and as a whole the orchestral score has rarely been given better treatment in local concert rooms.

The singers were well chosen, the soloists and the chorus filling the demands of the vocal numbers with eminent success.

Mr. Riddle's reading of the fairy drama has been made familiar in former seasons. In certain parts he shows an improvement over any of the work he has done here in this play, and he caught the spirit of the more humorous scenes in a very happy fashion. No man can fully realize the airy grace of the fairy lines, and a full dress suit of the modern day in constant evidence fails to aid the imagination in picturing the scenes in which Oberon and Titania take prominence.

As a whole, however, the evening proved an enjoyable one and afforded many a source of constant pleasure.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Antoinette Trebelli will be the soloist and the programme will include Brahms's fourth symphony, the prelude to J. K. Paine's "Edipus" and the "King Stephen" overture by Beethoven.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-second concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme consisting of Shakespeare's "Midsummer-Night's Dream" with Mendelssohn's overture and incidental music. Mr. George Riddle was the reader; Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier sang the soprano and contralto solo parts, and the chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia.

If ever a composer showed genius and the finest sense of poetic and dramatic fitness in writing incidental music to a play, Mendelssohn has done so in his music to "Midsummer-Night's Dream." When one considers that wonderful overture written at the age of seventeen, and the rest of the music, written at thirty-four, one cannot help feeling a touch of ill will toward that well-meaning, but rather borne old tyrant, Abraham Mendelssohn, for doing his best to divert his son's rare genius from its native channel, and dry it up by premature forcing. To think that Mendelssohn gave to the world only four of those wondrously poetic and imaginative tone-poems—the overtures to "Midsummer-Night's Dream," "Die Fingals-Höhle," "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," and "Zur schönen Melusine,"—absolutely original in their day, as they are still ineffably beautiful, when, had not the grim old father stood over him with his inveterate pedantry, he might have left a good dozen such in his musical legacy to the world! If the "Fingals-Höhle" is probably the most completely fine of these four overtures, the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" is surely the one which shows the greatest freshness of invention, originality, and most brilliant imaginativeness. Weber himself has not painted the world of poetic fancy and tricky magic in truer nor more charming colors. And the boy Mendelssohn was only seventeen when he wrote it! He still had tolerably sound nerves then, and could be wholesomely tricky and frolicsome without a trace of that rather morbid, involuntary restlessness that mars so much in his later works. Both conductor and orchestra fairly outdid themselves; for nicety of perception, vitality of style and fine finish, it was from beginning to end the best performance of the season. One could hardly imagine finer playing of that delightful scherzo that follows the first act. Mr. Paur's slight, but none the less perceptible, modification of the tempo in the second section of the first part of the "Wedding March" was almost a stroke of genius; it is once in a dox's age that one hears a tempo taken that seems at once so surprisingly and so convincingly right. The chorus, too, sang most excellently; only the solos sounded rather meagre and lifeless.

267

It is some time since we last heard Mr. Riddle read; he has evidently made a most admirable use of that time. Not only has his talent ripened well, but he has made an enormous advance in the technique of his art, which he now pushes fairly to the pitch of virtuosity. His whole method is better than it was a year or two ago. Now he never interrupts the dialogue by naming the respective speakers, but trusts to the audience's having the printed text before their eyes in the programme books. Though he still resorts to the trick of assuming different voices for different characters, he does so with far more art than formerly, without crassness of contrast, and never, except intentionally, with grotesqueness of effect. "Midsummer-Night's Dream" is probably the play to which he has given the most study, and the text of which he has searched through most carefully for legitimately effective points. And his search has not been unrewarded; some of the points he makes are as good as they are (to us) new. One of the best of these is where Quince—remembering Flute's mistake at rehearsal about "Ninny's tomb"—appears as Prologue to "The most lamentable Comedy," and takes particular pains to pronounce "Ni-nus' tomb" with comical distinctness; the point was made with the dearest lightness of touch, and told immediately upon the whole audience; everyone saw it. To hear Shakespeare's play so read and Mendelssohn's music so played is about as delightful a treat as we can well imagine. The public evidently expected great things, for the hall was crowded; and we mistake much if the highest expectations were not realized.

The Twenty-second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—A Fine Performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Music.

At the twenty-second Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall the overture and the incidental music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" made up the program. Mr. George Riddle read portions of the play. Mrs. Marie B. Smith and Miss Whittier sang the incidental solos. The choruses were sung by members of the Cecilia.

This music to Shakespeare's play, the play that Mr. Pepys thought such poor stuff, is still fresh and delightful. The overture is an exhibition of the spontaneous and the most charming style of Mendelssohn's musical nature; it was written before he became a dealer in mannerisms, and yet it has the peculiar hall mark of his talent. It is true that in delicacy the fairy scherzo, "Queen Mab" of Berlioz, surpasses any portion of the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," but on the other hand Mendelssohn had the gift of more genuine melody.

The Germans, who are so fond of Shakespeare that they claim to have discovered first his genius or even to have invented him, have better opportunities than we to hear this music in connection with the play. They that have heard such performances in the leading towns of Germany know how admirably the music fits the action of clown or fairy. Given thus with gorgeous scenic accessories and with a ballet, the play is a most entertaining spectacle.

Mr. Riddle read with his accustomed elocutionary skill and with fine appreciation of the beauty and the humor of the text. Some might quarrel with his conception of Bottom and prefer a dull, logy, yet uncouth ass. Mr. Riddle presents him rather as a hard, boisterous fellow, and no doubt he has a right to do this; he certainly carries out his conception admirably.

The musical performance was excellent. The overture was finely read and played. The music that accompanies the speaker was given with rare precision and effect.

The horn solo in the nocturne was well played, and the wood-wind was heard to great advantage throughout. The wedding march was taken at a slower pace than is customary, and the result was a stately grandeur in conception that became the marriage of Duke Theseus, and a clearness in certain passages for the brass that are often crackly and ragged when a faster tempo is chosen. The chorus and the solo singers lent valuable assistance. Many stood in the audience throughout the performance, and the applause was frequent and hearty.

The program of next Saturday's concert will be as follows: Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Paine's prelude to "Edipus," and Beethoven's overture, "King Stephen." Miss Antoinette Trebelli will sing arias from "Don Giovanni" and Massenet's "Cid."

PHILIP HALE.

The accomplished editor of the Boston Symphony program books stated last week that the first performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" was under the direction of Mr. Lang in Music Hall, April 23, 1864. This statement is not true. The music was given with the play in theatres of Boston before that date.

reader, woman or man, who might safely challenge comparison with him in this most difficult task; but we know of none such. He has a peculiar natural fitness in the melodious tone and extended compass of his voice, to whose sweet, fine, high and suave qualities his art has added depth, strength and upon occasion a ruggedness which at first seems quite unreconcilable with those other elements as the product of one and the same organ. He is alike happy in the fanciful airy volings of Puck and the spirits, the femininity of Helena and Hermia, and in the rough, strident outcries of Bottom. More than this, his musical disposition is sensitive and he follows with harmonious sympathy the course of each passage of melodrama. Were we to make a criticism, it would be that in sentimental dialogue he seems less sincere and plastic than in the energetic or humorous; but to urge this might seem like cavilling, and would certainly be unnecessary. Of course, it hardly needs to be added that his diction is elegant, his attention to even minor points of emphasis true, his regard to rhythm invariable and his phrasing scholarly.

Next Saturday's programme gives the orchestra Brahms's fourth symphony, the prelude to Professor Paine's "Edipus" and Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture. The soloist will be Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli, daughter of the famous contralto. She has but recently arrived in this country, and she chooses for this occasion arias from "Don Giovanni" and Massenet's "Le Cid."

The New York Musical Courier continues its malleious and ignorant talk about the conductorship of the Boston orchestra in two more despicable and misleading paragraphs. What its object can be in thus malignantly attacking Mr. Paur and insolently assuming to speak for Mr. Higginson, is beyond even guessing. The only possible explanation or excuse is that it has gone mad with chagrin because its desire to recommend some unsuitable nominee of its own, for the position was passed over with silent contempt. If the Courier told truths, one would not mind its violent language and its ridiculous dictatorial tone. But there may be people in obscure places who will believe in its diatribes just because of their clamorous and confident manner, and it is therefore a pity that some pages out of its own history cannot be reprinted as a warning to those who may imagine that it is always honest and impartial and that it has never had to make mortifying retractions.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last evening's concert at Music Hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra included Mendelssohn's music for Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." The connecting dialogue was read by Mr. George Riddle and the vocal numbers were given with the assistance of Mrs. Marie Barnard-Smith, Miss Harriet S. Whittier, and a chorus of the Cecilia singers.

Mr. Paur's reading of the overture was a most fascinating one, and all of the instrumental music was given an interpretation of the most pleasing sort. The graceful scherzo, the wedding march and the other more familiar concert pieces were delightfully played, and as a whole the orchestral score has rarely been given better treatment in local concert rooms.

The singers were well chosen, the soloists and the chorus filling the demands of the vocal numbers with eminent success.

Mr. Riddle's reading of the fairy drama has been made familiar in former seasons. In certain parts he shows an improvement over any of the work he has done here in this play, and he caught the spirit of the more humorous scenes in a very happy fashion. No man can fully realize the airy grace of the fairy lines, and a full dress suit of the modern day in constant evidence fails to aid the imagination in picturing the scenes in which Oberon and Titania take prominence.

As a whole, however, the evening proved an enjoyable one and afforded many a source of constant pleasure.

Next Saturday evening Mme. Antoinette Trebelli will be the soloist and the programme will include Brahms's fourth symphony, the prelude to J. K. Paine's "Edipus" and the "King Stephen" overture by Beethoven.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-second concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme consisting of Shakespeare's "Midsummer-Night's Dream" with Mendelssohn's overture and incidental music. Mr. George Riddle was the reader; Mrs. Marie Barnard Smith and Miss Harriet S. Whittier sang the soprano and contralto solo parts, and the chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia.

If ever a composer showed genius and the finest sense of poetic and dramatic fitness in writing incidental music to a play, Mendelssohn has done so in his music to "Midsummer-Night's Dream." When one considers that wonderful overture written at the age of seventeen, and the rest of the music, written at thirty-four, one cannot help feeling a touch of ill will toward that well-meaning, but rather borne old tyrant, Abraham Mendelssohn, for doing his best to divert his son's rare genius from its native channel, and dry it up by premature forcing. To think that Mendelssohn gave to the world only four of those wondrously poetic and imaginative tone-poems—the overtures to "Midsummer-Night's Dream," "Die Fingals-Höhle," "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt," and "Zur schönen Melusine"—absolutely original in their day, as they are still ineffably beautiful, when, had not the grim old father stood over him with his inveterate pedantry, he might have left a good dozen such in his musical legacy to the world! If the "Fingals-Höhle" is probably the most completely fine of these four overtures, the "Midsummer-Night's Dream" is surely the one which shows the greatest freshness of invention, originality, and most brilliant imaginativeness. Weber himself has not painted the world of poetic fancy and tricky magic in truer nor more charming colors. And the boy Mendelssohn was only seventeen when he wrote it! He still had tolerably sound nerves then, and could be wholesomely tricky and frolicsome without a trace of that rather morbid, involuntary restlessness that mars so much in his later works. Both conductor and orchestra fairly outdid themselves; for nicety of perception, vitality of style and fine finish, it was from beginning to end the best performance of the season. One could hardly imagine finer playing of that delightful scherzo that follows the first act. Mr. Paur's slight, but none the less perceptible, modification of the tempo in the second section of the first part of the "Wedding March" was almost a stroke of genius; it is once in a dox's age that one hears a tempo taken that seems at once so surprisingly and so convincingly right. The chorus, too, sang most excellently; only the solos sounded rather meagre and lifeless.

It is some time since we last heard Mr. Riddle read; he has evidently made a most admirable use of that time. Not only has his talent ripened well, but he has made an enormous advance in the technique of his art, which he now pushes fairly to the pitch of virtuosity. His whole method is better than it was a year or two ago. Now he never interrupts the dialogue by naming the respective speakers, but trusts to the audience's having the printed text before their eyes in the programme books. Though he still resorts to the trick of assuming different voices for different characters, he does so with far more art than formerly, without crassness of contrast, and never, except intentionally, with grotesqueness of effect. "Midsummer - Night's Dream" is probably the play to which he has given the most study, and the text of which he has searched through most carefully for legitimately effective points. And his search has not been unrewarded; some of the points he makes are as good as they are (to us) new. One of the best of these is where Quince—remembering Flute's mistake at rehearsal about "Ninny's tomb"—appears as Prologue to "The most lamentable Comedy," and takes particular pains to pronounce "Ni-nus' tomb" with comical distinctness; the point was made with the dearest lightness of touch, and told immediately upon the whole audience; everyone saw it. To hear Shakespeare's play so read and Mendelssohn's music so played is about as delightful a treat as we can well imagine. The public evidently expected great things, for the hall was crowded; and we mistake much if the highest expectations were not realized.

The Twenty-second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra — A Fine Performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Music.

At the twenty-second Symphony concert last evening in Music Hall the overture and the incidental music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" made up the program. Mr. George Riddle read portions of the play. Mrs. Marie B. Smith and Miss Whittier sang the incidental solos. The choruses were sung by members of the Cecilia.

This music to Shakespeare's play, the play that Mr. Pepys thought such poor stuff, is still fresh and delightful. The overture is an exhibition of the spontaneous and the most charming style of Mendelssohn's musical nature; it was written before he became a dealer in mannerisms, and yet it has the peculiar hall mark of his talent. It is true that in delicacy the fairy scherzo, "Queen Mab" of Berlioz, surpasses any portion of the music to "Midsummer Night's Dream," but on the other hand Mendelssohn had the gift of more genuine melody.

The Germans, who are so fond of Shakespeare that they claim to have discovered first his genius or even to have invented him, have better opportunities than we to hear this music in connection with the play. They that have heard such performances in the leading towns of Germany know how admirably the music fits the action of clown or fairy. Given thus with gorgeous scenic accessories and with a ballet, the play is a most entertaining spectacle.

Mr. Riddle read with his accustomed elocutionary skill and with fine appreciation of the beauty and the humor of the text. Some might quarrel with his conception of Bottom and prefer a dull, logy, yet uncouth ass. Mr. Riddle presents him rather as a hard, boisterous fellow, and no doubt he has a right to do this; he certainly carries out his conception admirably.

The musical performance was excellent. The overture was finely read and played. The music that accompanies the speaker was given with rare precision and effect.

The horn solo in the nocturne was well played, and the wood-wind was heard to great advantage throughout. The wedding march was taken at a slower pace than is customary, and the result was a stately grandeur in conception that became the marriage of Duke Theseus, and a clearness in certain passages for the brass that are often crackly and ragged when a faster tempo is chosen. The chorus and the solo singers lent valuable assistance. Many stood in the audience throughout the performance, and the applause was frequent and hearty.

The program of next Saturday's concert will be as follows: Brahms's Fourth Symphony, Paine's prelude to "Edipus," and Beethoven's overture, "King Stephen." Miss Antoinette Trebelli will sing arias from "Don Giovanni" and Massenet's "Cid."

PHILIP HALE.

The accomplished editor of the Boston Symphony program books stated last week that the first performance of Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" was under the direction of Mr. Lang in Music Hall, April 23, 1864. This statement is not true. The music was given with the play in theatres of Boston before that date.

208
THE PAUR STORY.
Regardless of the fact that Mr. Higginson has said that Mr. Paur is engaged for a "term of years," and that Mr. Paur has also declared for publication that he "is engaged for five years, with an additional five years if all is satisfactory," the New York Musical Courier breaks out again with the following statement in its last issue:

"Naturally Mr. Paur did not like the news published about him in these columns last week. Several Boston journals took up the cudgels for his defence, and blamed some members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the prevailing gossip. The fact of the matter is that this is no question of gossip or personal disgruntlement, but simply that Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted; and that appeals more powerfully to the backer of the famous organization than all the petty talk about improved discipline and the good musicianship of the conductor."

"Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second rate conductor. He does not begin to fill the boots of Nikisch, and the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts. The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality. Colonel Higginson is not the man to stand this sort of thing very long. Mr. Paur is a failure, a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words? Mr. Paur must go."

The Courier might as well blame Mr. Paur for the wretched state of business generally throughout the country as to blame him for the deferring of the Western tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, because of his "lack of popularity and personality," as claimed by the Courier.

Since these "blessed Democratic days" have come upon us and paralyzed every branch of business and closed up the majority of industrial establishments, or reduced the pay of the employees to the low rate of "Cleveland wages," Mr. Higginson has been obliged, like all careful and discriminating business men, to defer many other business ventures, no doubt owing to the universal prostration brought about through the election of the Democratic party to the management of the affairs of government. It is a mighty poor effort on the part of the Courier to try to bolster up the failure of Nikisch to prove himself a suitable man for the position so ably filled by Mr. Paur, by decrying the latter. It won't work, gentlemen.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC NOTES.

Mr. Max Heinrich and Mr. Arthur Whiting, two of our best local artists, will give a delightful programme tonight in Steinert Hall, embracing a cyclis from Scheffel's poem, "Die Gaudeamus Lieder," the music by Jensen. Mr. Otto Roth will assist and play some new Swedish dances for the violin, composed by Max Bruch.

Information comes from Buda Pesth that the intendant of the Royal Opera there has invited Mr. Josef Grossmann of the City Theatre at Cologne to come to Buda, Pesth and conduct three operas there, and if his work is satisfactory he will be engaged for five years as capellmeister of the Grand Opera, beginning Sept. 1, 1894. The inference to be drawn from this is that Mr. Arthur Nikisch is to sever his connection with the Buda Pesth opera as capellmeister. There were people in this city who prophesied that Mr. Nikisch would not remain long at Buda Pesth, for Count Ziehy, the intendant, is very exacting and will not tolerate either an indifferent or incompetent person in the position of capellmeister at that Opera House.

It may be that this losing of his job at Buda-Pesth by Nikisch is the cat in the meal at the office of the N.Y. Musical Courier, and that the extraordinary efforts made lately by our esteemed contemporary, looking towards the discharge of Mr. Paur from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because, as the Courier has said, "Mr. Paur does not begin to fill the boots of Mr. Nikisch," have been exerted in behalf of a re-engagement of the little poseur who encumbered for four seasons the position now so ably filled by Mr. Paur. A musical diet of the re-warmed baked-meats of Nikisch's incompetency will never be relished by Mr. Higginson or the musical public, either, not even with a piquante sauce, a la Musical Courier.

BY K. KLAUSER.

f up and down experiences and it advisable not to torture rily (with technical difficulties with but moderate efforts to in tone color and in dyna lation (Verbesserungsucht l an incorrigible evil. In ill receive a proof of it by (gements) Beethoven's sym eitkopf & Härtel. Three of f twenty years ago)* I have hese with the other six I in ibution to the normal art o laviersatz).

33.

del Rosario).

KS ABOUT MUSIC.

chapter in Arthur Hervey'

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

J. K. PAINE.

PRELUDE to "Œdipus Tyrannus" of SOPHOCLES, op. 35.

MOZART.

RECITATIVE, "Crudele? Ah no, mio bene!" and ARIA, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni."

BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

MASSNET.

ARIA from HERODIADE. "Il est bon, il est doux."

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE to "König Stephan," in E flat major, op. 117.

Soloist:

Mlle. ANTOINETTE TREBELL.

THE PAUR STORY.

Regardless of the fact that Mr. Higginson has said that Mr. Paur is engaged for a "term of years," and that Mr. Paur has also declared for publication that he "is engaged for five years, with an additional five years if all is satisfactory," the New York Musical Courier breaks out again with the following statement in its last issue:

"Naturally Mr. Paur did not like the news published about him in these columns last week. Several Boston journals took up the cudgels for his defence, and blamed some members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the prevailing gossip. The fact of the matter is that this is no question of gossip or personal disgruntlement, but simply that Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted; and that appeals more powerfully to the backer of the famous organization than all the petty talk about improved discipline and the good musicianship of the conductor."

"Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second rate conductor. He does not begin to fill the boots of Nikisch, and the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts. The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality. Colonel Higginson is not the man to stand this sort of thing very long. Mr. Paur is a failure, a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words? Mr. Paur must go."

The Courier might as well blame Mr. Paur for the wretched generally throughout the tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, because of popularity and personality by the Courier.

Since these "blessed" have come upon us as a branch of business and industry of industrial establishments reduced the pay of the emperors of "Cleveland" war has been obliged, it discriminating business many other business owing to the universal about through the electric party to the affairs of government. poor effort on the part try to bolster up the fact prove himself a sultan position so ably filled decrying the latter. It tlemen.

WARREN

MUSIC NO

Mr. Max Heinrich Whiting, two of our will give a delightful p in Steinert Hall, embracing Scheffel's poem, "Die der," the music by Jensen. Mr. Otto Roth will assist and play some new Swedish dances for the violin, composed by Max Bruch.

Information comes from Buda Pesth that the intendant of the Royal Opera there has invited Mr. Josef Grossmann of the City Theatre at Cologne to come to Buda, Pesth and conduct three operas there, and if his work is satisfactory he will be engaged for five years as capellmeister of the Grand Opera, beginning Sept. 1, 1894. The inference to be drawn from this is that Mr. Arthur Nikisch is to sever his connection with the Buda Pesth opera as capellmeister. There were people in this city who prophesied that Mr. Nikisch would not remain long at Buda Pesth, for Count Zichy, the intendant, is very exacting and will not tolerate either an indifferent or incompetent person in the position of capellmeister at that Opera House.

It may be that this losing of his job at Buda-Pesth by Nikisch is the cat in the meal at the office of the N.Y. Musical Courier, and that the extraordinary efforts made lately by our esteemed contemporary, looking towards the discharge of Mr. Paur from the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because, as the Courier has said, "Mr. Paur does not begin to fill the boots of Mr. Nikisch," have been exerted in behalf of a re-engagement of the little poseur who encumbered for four seasons the position now so ably filled by Mr. Paur. A musical diet of the re-warmed baked-meats of Nikisch's incompetency will never be relished by Mr. Higginson or the musical public, either, not even with a piquante sauce, a la Musical Courier.

MR. PAUR DID NOT LIKE IT.

NATURALLY Mr. Paur did not like the news published about him in these columns last week. Several Boston journals took up the cudgels for his defence, and blamed some of the members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the prevailing gossip. The fact of the matter is that this is no question of gossip or personal disgruntlement, but simply that Mr. Paur will not do. He is not wanted; and that appeals more powerfully to the backer of the famous organization than all the petty talk about improved discipline and the good musicianship of the conductor.

Mr. Paur is an excellent artist, but a second rate conductor. He does not begin to fill the boots of Nikisch, and the public have loudly proclaimed this fact by not going to his concerts. The Western and Southern tours and festivals had to be abandoned because of Mr. Paur's lack of popularity and personality. Colonel Higginson is not the man to stand this sort of thing very long. Mr. Paur is a failure, a business failure, an artistic failure. Why juggle with words? Mr. Paur must go.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XXIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, APRIL 21, AT 8, P.M.

PROGRAMME.

J. K. PAINE.

PRELUDE to "Œdipus Tyrannus" of SOPHOCLES, op. 35.

MOZART.

RECITATIVE, "Crudele? Ah no, mio bene!" and ARIA, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni."

BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY No. 4, in E minor, op. 98.

I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Andante moderato.
III. Allegro giocoso.
IV. Allegro energico e passionato.

MASSENET.

ARIA from HERODIADE. "Il est bon, il est doux."

BEETHOVEN.

OVERTURE to "König Stephan," in E flat major, op. 117.

Soloist:

Mlle. ANTOINETTE TREBELL.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

[See Page Seven.]

Juan

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Paine: Prelude to the "Edipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, Opus 35.

Mozart: Recitative, "Crudele! Ah no, mio bene!" and Aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni."

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Opus 98.

Massenet: Recitative, "Celui dont la parole," and Air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Hérodiade."

Beethoven: Overture to "König Stephan," Opus 117. Mile. Antoinette Trebelli was the singer.

It was good to hear Mr. Paine's noble and dramatic prelude once more. Many of us well remember the thrill it gave us on that eventful evening in Sanders Theatre, some years ago, and how it put us into just the right receptive mood for the great tragedy that followed. If, like all genuinely dramatic preludes, it produces its best effect in its proper frame,—for it strikes the note of preparation and warning, and is not a fully complete thing in itself,—it has yet that in it that makes one glad to hear it at a concert. The music to "Edipus Tyrannus" marks the full development of Mr. Paine's individual style, of what may be called his second manner. There was, upon the whole, but a short transition period leading from his earlier organ works, the pianoforte sonatas, and the Mass in D to this second manner of his; "St. Peter" was the transitional work; in it, as in Wagner's "Lohengrin," almost the whole process of change can be traced. And yet, although one finds his second manner already pretty firmly established in parts of this oratorio, it is not until the "Edipus Tyrannus" that we find it fully developed. Here he has, as the Germans say, fully discovered himself. It is somewhat curious, when we consider Mr. Paine's Anglo-Saxon blood and German training, to note how nearly his modes of expression approach the French in the "Edipus" prelude; if the thought and feeling are plainly Northern and un-Latin, the form and expression are very French indeed. The work is too much Mr. Paine's own for one to speak of any special "influences" shown in it; yet, either by chance or similarity of dramatic ideal, he has drifted into a style that recalls Massenet and other modern Frenchmen, at their best, far more vividly than it does Wagner or any modern German. One finds that quasi-declamatory, recitative-like treatment in certain passages, and again that simple, broad development of melodious cantilena, that are characteristically French. Of other, less praiseworthy, French traits—of merely glittering superficiality of expression, or of that laziness of style that masquerades as "simplicity"—one finds no trace; the work is sincerely earnest from beginning to end. It was admirably played, and the composer was given an enthusiastic ovation by the delighted audience.

Brahms's great E-minor symphony was grandly played. In point of tempo the first and second movements seemed to us perfect; the third movement was, perhaps, taken just a shade too fast for entire clearness, and we should have liked the 3-2 time of the final Passacaglia to have gone a little more slowly—the variations in 3-2 time were, on the other hand, quite slow enough. It is to be noted, as regards this Finale, that Mr. Paur is the first to have made the flutes, first oboe, and first trombone play with sufficient vigor in the first eight measures to throw the theme into audible relief. Brahms's scoring in these eight measures, as in the first two measures of the first movement of his F-major symphony, is peculiar, one might almost say reckless, and seems calculated to veil the theme, rather than to give it prominence. We have never yet heard that all-important "F, A-flat, F" at the beginning of the F major symphony brought out with recognizable clearness; and last Saturday evening was the first time we have heard the theme of this Passacaglia in the E-minor symphony made distinctly audible. This is one of the very many passages in Brahms's orchestral works that require no little careful "doctoring" at rehearsal, if they are to sound clear at performance.

Beethoven's overture to Kotzebue's "König Stephan" is, with the possible exception of that to "Die Ruinen von Athen," his lightest overture; it is, in fact, a regular "theatre overture" in the fullest sense of the term. But it is bright, sparkling, and has all his characteristic energy and ebullency. There is little depth to it, and it often verges dangerously on the trivial; but one may say of it, on the whole, that here Beethoven "s'encanaillait — mais très-noblement!" It was brilliantly played.

Miss Antoinette Trebelli has a brilliant, rather light soprano voice, in the use of which she shows considerable skill. In the final Allegretto of Donna Anna's great aria she did those much-debated coloratura-passages very cleverly indeed, and came nearer to bringing the whole to an effective close than most singers we have heard. She still lacks, however, something of the depth and maturity of feeling and power of dramatic expression that would fit her to do full justice to this aria. She sang the Massenet air excellently well; we should have said, a little coldly, had it not been for the evident ecstasies into which she threw the audience, and "cold" singing seldom has this result. She was rapturously and repeatedly recalled.

The next, and last, programme is: Wagner, Huldigungs-Marsch; Liszt, "Mephisto-Waltz;" Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," opus 81; Beethoven, symphony No. 6, in F major ("Pastoral"), opus 68.

— Apropos of the recent "kick-up" in the Symphony Orchestra, to which I referred lately, I was much amused the other evening at the closing concert of season to notice the flagrantly inimical front sustained by the coterie of "first violins" in regard to their leader. When Mr. Paur made his entrée, and again at finale, the whole house actually rose to the occasion and applauded vociferously. But, quite contrary to their usual custom, the first violins preserved a stolid and stoical indifference toward their leader, not much even as tapping with their bows, and thus made themselves more conspicuous than was Mr. Paur. This open declaration of a hitherto denied animosity, clearly convinced me as to the exact state of affairs, so that I mentioned a fortnight ago, and it provokes, I think, the advisability of following my suggestion "shipping" these over-petted darlings of fashion. "house divided against itself," etc., is a motto as applicable, presumably, to orchestras as to architectural Town Topics.

The twenty third Symphony programme presented no novelty in the way of music; for although Professor Paine's serious and appropriate "Edipus" prelude had then its first hearing in such a connection, it could not be set down as anything really new in spite of its being rather unfamiliar. It was calmly and comprehendingly read. The symphony, which had the central position in the concert, was Brahms's fourth. This may not unfairly be described as a descending series expressed in terms of music instead of mathematics; for its interest—unless for the admirer of mere thematic evolution—declines distinctly from the first and second movements to the third and thence across a great gap to the dull and labored fourth. The playing matched the composition, being bright and earnest in the first movement, genially grave in the second, emphatic and slightly uncouth in the third, uneasy and not always definite in the fourth. The only other orchestral number was Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, a fine and illuminated composition, but better suited for its intended place as a prologue than for that which Mr. Paur gave it as a finale. Something of different class and calibre is needed for the end of these programmes instead of the selections which he is wont to make.

There were two numbers for soprano voice, sung by Mile. Antoinette Trebelli—daughter of the eminent contralto—who came as a stranger to the symphony. The first was the so-called "Letter" scene in "Don Giovanni," and the second was to be the light and lively bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers." This latter did not materialize, however, either because the orchestral parts could not be obtained or because (which is quite as likely a reason) it was tabooed on account of its Italian origin. (And again parenthetically, it is a constant cause of regret that American concerts should be so characteristically German as the Music Hall evenings are.) In place of the Verdi was therefore substituted the pleasant short air from Massenet's "Hérodiade," which is getting to be pretty nearly an old story. The singer is a sweet-faced young woman of modest demeanor and easy bearing. Her voice is fresh, equable and limpid, and her style simple but fine—better however in vocalization than in diction, for although her phrases were charmingly enunciated, scarcely a word of her texts could be understood. She gratified her hearers and was handsomely recalled.

The assistant-editor of the programme-book, M. Hector Berlioz, of Paris, really ought to be replaced next season by somebody who should be less like a man of the past. The partiality of the editor and the tolerance of the public has allowed him to reprint vast sections of his own "Across Country" and other books. But when he goes back several decades to print his garbled and incorrect account of Jenny Lind's visit to this country, one really must protest and regret that the inadvertence of the editor should have allowed these statements, quite as misleading as anything in Dickens or Mrs. Trollope, to occupy pages which might have been filled with profitable romance or veritable history.

The last programme to be performed this week, is not particularly interesting and stands thus: Wagner's Huldigung's March, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Beethoven's sixth symphony.

Mr. De Koven has given another indication of his calibre, his limitations of knowledge, his uncertainty about facts and the vague value of his opinions by joining the cabal which is sowing the wind to reap a sure whirlwind by impugning the ability and worth of Mr. Paur. Considering that Mr. DeKoven is capable of confounding (in print, we mean) Cimarosa and Mozart; that he has been known to use up the valuable space assigned him for really critical use, in commendation of an embryo artist whose chief recommendation appeared to be that she sang his songs; and considering that he does not seem always to remember that some of his tunes have had recognizable prototypes—it would seem to be wise for him to go slow in interfering—(or rather, trying to interfere) in the conduct of musical affairs in Boston. And further, considering what is known of some methods of the paper which he is trying to aid and abet, one cannot help wondering whether all this would-be injurious assault upon Mr. Paur would have taken place, if he had sent his portrait, with a liberal subscription to that same paper and had found room in his programmes, as the vain and foolish Nikisch did, for some of the pretty little pages of music ascribed to one of its editors. And while we are upon this subject, let us say one thing more. It behooves a few members of the orchestra to be careful in their attempt to rule the roast. Some of them have done excellent service to the cause of music in Boston; and they have also done mischief. While making their own enterprises successful, they have not refrained from trying to make those of other men unsuccessful. They have done good for the orchestra; but the orchestra has done more for them. They are valuable; but there are hosts of other men who are worth as much in every way. The orchestra must be one unit, not many; and if any individuals, no matter how able or how prominent, attempt to inject their individuality into its composition, it is they who "must go" and not the conductor. One would regret to have them dropped and their particular friends and pupils might set up an outcry. But they can be spared, every one of them; and there would then be a chance for some players to rise and become known who have hitherto been ignored and even suppressed because they were

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

[See Page Seven.]

Trans.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Paine: Prelude to the "Edipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, Opus 35.

Mozart: Recitative, "Crudele! Ah no, mio bene!" and Aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni."

Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Opus 98.

Massenet: Recitative, "Celui dont la parole," and Air, "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Hérodiade."

Beethoven: Overture to "König Stephan," Opus 117.

Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli was the singer.

It was good to hear Mr. Paine's noble and dramatic prelude once more. Many of us well remember the thrill it gave us on that eventful evening in Sanders Theatre, some years ago, and how it put us into just the right receptive mood for the great tragedy that followed. If, like all genuinely dramatic preludes, it produces its best effect in its proper frame,—for it strikes the note of preparation and warning, and is not a fully complete thing in itself,—it has yet that in it that makes one glad to hear it at a concert. The music to "Edipus Tyrannus" marks the full development of Mr. Paine's individual style, of what may be called his second manner. There was, upon the whole, but a short transition period leading from his earlier organ works, the pianoforte sonatas, and the Mass in D to this second manner of his; "St. Peter" was the transitional work; in it, as in Wagner's "Lohengrin," almost the whole process of change can be traced. And yet, although one finds his second manner already pretty firmly established in parts of this oratorio, it is not until the "Edipus Tyrannus" that we find it fully developed. Here he has, as the Germans say, fully discovered himself. It is somewhat curious, when we consider Mr. Paine's Anglo-Saxon blood and German training, to note how nearly his modes of expression approach the French in the "Edipus" prelude; if the thought and feeling are plainly Northern and un-Latin, the form and expression are very French indeed. The work is too much Mr. Paine's own for one to speak of any special "influences" shown in it; yet, either by chance or similarity of dramatic ideal, he has drifted into a style that recalls Massenet and other modern Frenchmen, at their best, far more vividly than it does Wagner or any modern German. One finds that quasi-declamatory, recitative-like treatment in certain passages, and again that simple, broad development of melodious cantilena, that are characteristically French. Of other, less praiseworthy, French traits—of merely glittering superficiality of expression, or of that laziness of style that masquerades as "simplicity"—one finds no trace; the work is sincerely earnest from beginning to end. It was admirably played, and the composer was given an enthusiastic ovation by the delighted audience.

Brahms's great E-minor symphony was grandly played. In point of tempo the first and second movements seemed to us perfect; the third movement was, perhaps, taken just a shade too fast for entire clearness, and we should have liked the 3-2 time of the final Passacaglia to have gone a little more slowly—the variations in 3-2 time were, on the other hand, quite slow enough. It is to be noted, as regards this Finale, that Mr. Paur is the first to have made the flutes, first oboe, and first trombone play with sufficient vigor in the first eight measures to throw the theme into audible relief. Brahms's scoring in these eight measures, as in the first two measures of the first movement of his F-major symphony, is peculiar, one might almost say reckless, and seems calculated to veil the theme, rather than to give it prominence. We have never yet heard that all-important "F. A-flat, F" at the beginning of the F major symphony brought out with recognizable clearness; and last Saturday evening was the first time we have heard the theme of this Passacaglia in the E-minor symphony made distinctly audible. This is one of the very many passages in Brahms's orchestral works that require no little careful "doctoring" at rehearsal, if they are to sound clear at performance.

Beethoven's overture to Kotzebue's "König Stephan" is, with the possible exception of that to "Die Ruinen von Athen," his lightest overture; it is, in fact, a regular "theatre overture" in the fullest sense of the term. But it is bright, sparkling, and has all his characteristic energy and ebulliency. There is little depth to it, and it often verges dangerously on the trivial; but one may say of it, on the whole, that here Beethoven "s'encanaillait — mais très-noblement!" It was brilliantly played.

Miss Antoinette Trebelli has a brilliant, rather light soprano voice, in the use of which she shows considerable skill. In the final Allegretto of Donna Anna's great aria she did those much-debated coloratura-passages very cleverly indeed, and came nearer to bringing the whole to an effective close than most singers we have heard. She still lacks, however, something of the depth and maturity of feeling and power of dramatic expression that would fit her to do full justice to this aria. She sang the Massenet air excellently well; we should have said, a little coldly, had it not been for the evident ecstasies into which she threw the audience, and "cold" singing seldom has this result. She was rapturously and repeatedly recalled.

The next, and last, programme is: Wagner, Huldigungs-Marsch; Liszt, "Mephisto-Waltz;" Schumann, overture to "Genoveva," opus 81; Beethoven, symphony No. 6, in F major ("Pastoral"), opus 68.

— Apropos of the recent "kick-up" in the Symphony Orchestra, to which I referred lately, I was amused the other evening at the closing concert of the season to notice the flagrantly inimical front sustained by the coterie of "first violins" in regard to their leader. When Mr. Paur made his entrée, and again at the finale, the whole house actually rose to the occasion and applauded vociferously. But, quite contrary to their usual custom, the first violins preserved a stolid and stoical indifference toward their leader, not much even as tapping with their bows, and thus made themselves more conspicuous than was Mr. Paur. The open declaration of a hitherto denied animosity, clearly convinced me as to the exact state of affairs, so that I mentioned a fortnight ago, and it provokes me to think, the advisability of following my suggestion "shipping" these over-petted darlings of fashion, "house divided against itself," etc., is a motto as applicable, presumably, to orchestras as to architectural Town Topics.

The twenty-third Symphony programme presented no novelty in the way of music; for although Professor Paine's serious and appropriate "Edipus" prelude had then its first hearing in such a connection, it could not be set down as anything really new in spite of its being rather unfamiliar. It was calmly and comprehendingly read. The symphony, which had the central position in the concert, was Brahms's fourth. This may not unfairly be described as a descending series expressed in terms of music instead of mathematics; for its interest—unless for the admirer of mere thematic evolution—declines distinctly from the first and second movements to the third and thence across a great gap to the dull and labored fourth. The playing matched the composition, being bright and earnest in the first movement, genially grave in the second, emphatic and slightly uncouth in the third, uneasy and not always definite in the fourth. The only other orchestral number was Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture, a fine and illuminated composition, but better suited for its intended place as a prologue than for that which Mr. Paur gave it as a finale. Something of different class and calibre is needed for the end of these programmes instead of the selections which he is wont to make.

There were two numbers for soprano voice, sung by Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli—daughter of the eminent contralto—who came as a stranger to the symphony. The first was the so-called "Letter" scene in "Don Giovanni," and the second was to be the light and lively bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers." This latter did not materialize, however, either because the orchestral parts could not be obtained or because (which is quite as likely a reason) it was tabooed on account of its Italian origin. (And again parenthetically, it is a constant cause of regret that American concerts should be so characteristically German as the Music Hall evenings are.) In place of the Verdi was therefore substituted the pleasant short air from Massenet's "Hérodiade," which is getting to be pretty nearly an old story. The singer is a sweet-faced young woman of modest demeanor and easy bearing. Her voice is fresh, equable and limpid, and her style simple but fine—better however in vocalization than in diction, for although her phrases were charmingly enunciated, scarcely a word of her texts could be understood. She gratified her hearers and was handsomely recalled.

The assistant-editor of the programme-book, M. Hector Berlioz, of Paris, really ought to be replaced next season by somebody who should be less like a man of the past. The partiality of the editor and the tolerance of the public has allowed him to reprint vast sections of his own "Across Country" and other books. But when he goes back several decades to print his garbled and incorrect account of Jenny Lind's visit to this country, one really must protest and regret that the inadvertence of the editor should have allowed these statements, quite as misleading as anything in Dickens or Mrs. Trollope, to occupy pages which might have been filled with profitable romance or veritable history.

The last programme to be performed this week, is not particularly interesting and stands thus: Wagner's Huldigungs-Marsch, Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, and Beethoven's sixth symphony.

Mr. De Koven has given another indication of his calibre, his limitations of knowledge, his uncertainty about facts and the vague value of his opinions by joining the cabal which is sowing the wind to reap a sure whirlwind by impugning the ability and worth of Mr. Paur. Considering that Mr. DeKoven is capable of confounding (in print, we mean) Cimarosa and Mozart; that he has been known to use up the valuable space assigned him for really critical use, in commendation of an embryo artist whose chief recommendation appeared to be that she sang his songs; and considering that he does not seem always to remember that some of his tunes have had recognizable prototypes—it would seem to be wise for him to go slow in interfering—(or rather, trying to interfere) in the conduct of musical affairs in Boston. And further, considering what is known of some methods of the paper which he is trying to aid and abet, one cannot help wondering whether all this would-be injurious assault upon Mr. Paur would have taken place, if he had sent his portrait, with a liberal subscription to that same paper and had found room in his programmes, as the vain and foolish Nikisch did, for some of the pretty little pages of music ascribed to one of its editors. And while we are upon this subject, let us say one thing more. It behooves a few members of the orchestra to be careful in their attempt to rule the roast. Some of them have done excellent service to the cause of music in Boston; and they have also done mischief. While making their own enterprises successful, they have not refrained from trying to make those of other men unsuccessful. They have done good for the orchestra; but the orchestra has done more for them. They are valuable; but there are hosts of other men who are worth as much in every way. The orchestra must be one unit, not many; and if any individuals, no matter how able or how prominent, attempt to inject their individuality into its composition, it is they who "must go" and not the conductor. One would regret to have them dropped and their particular friends and pupils might set up an outcry. But they can be spared, every one of them; and there would then be a chance for some players to rise and become known who have hitherto been ignored and even suppressed because they were not of the clique or had had the audacity to be born Americans. There is a good deal of truth known within the school house which may be told outside if prudence and self-preservation do not lead these injudicious gentlemen to be quiet, obedient and fair. H. M. Tucker, Comm.

272

MUSIC. Journal
The 23d Symphony Concert in Music Hall and the Successful Appearance of Miss Antoinette Trebelli.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Miss Antoinette Trebelli was the singer. The program was as follows:

Prelude to "Edipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles. J. K. Paine
Recitative and aria, "Non mi dir, bell' idolo mio," from "Don Giovanni".....Mozart
Symphony No. 4.....Brahms
Aria from Herodiade, "Il est bon, il est doux".....Massenet
Overture to "King Stephen".....Beethoven

Miss Antoinette Trebelli is the daughter of Zélie Thérèse Caroline Gillebert de Beaulieu, who, known to the public as Madame Trebelli, was one of the most famous opera singers of the last 30 years. The mother was married in 1863 to Bettini, an Italian singer, and Rossini was one of the witnesses at the marriage ceremony. Born in 1838, she died in 1892. It is said she took her stage name from "Gillebert," which spelled backward makes Trebelli, and then the "g" was dropped.

The singer that pleased the audience last evening was born in April, 1864, if English accounts are to be believed; certainly, the singer looks younger. She studied first with her mother, then with Wartel, and afterward with Santley. She has thus far sung chiefly in concert and in oratorio. If I am not mistaken, she made her first appearance in St. James Hall, London, in concert with her mother. She has sung with marked success in Holland, Sweden, Norway and Russia. Her first appearance in this city was at the final Star Course entertainment in Music Hall, this month.

Miss Trebelli has an agreeable voice, which has been admirably trained. Her tone production is excellent; she sings with delightful ease; there are no facial contortions; there is no apparent and distressing jugulation. Her technique was last evening adequate throughout, in cantabile or in bravura. And the modesty and the girlish grace of the singer accentuated the pleasure given by her song. No wonder that the audience applauded enthusiastically.

It was also a pleasure to hear the noble overture of Prof. Paine, an overture fit to usher in the mighty tragedy of Sophocles. Indeed, the spirit of Grecian tragedy is in this music, for the passion is never forced, never boisterous, and in the stormiest passages there is form and there is beauty. Skillfully made, it is without taint of pedagogism. Although it is the work of a teacher, yea, of a professor, it is not academic. Dramatic, it is free from theatrical effect, nor is there here any absurd and desperate chase of local color. The music is free, fluent, noble in theme and in treatment, and, above all, it is passionate. Twice was Prof. Paine obliged to bow his acknowledgments to the applause of the audience.

Perhaps it is imperfect sympathy, but to me the fourth symphony of Brahms is not as truly a musical work as the second or the third. The second movement abounds in beautiful passages, and one must often pay tribute throughout the work to the mastery of the composer over all technical resources. Strength there is in plenty, and the strength is at times defiant, as though Brahms said "I wish it this way. You may like it or not; what care I?" And this sturdiness is perhaps to be admired. Certainly it is better than writing with one eye on the audience. But could not this sturdiness be tempered more with sensuousness? Is there not a species of prudery at times in the apparent reluctance of Brahms to write as though he wished to be heard by men only? Ruinous is it to a composer to fall into the musical eroticism that disfigures so much of the music of Gounod and Massenet. But Brahms occasionally invites the suspicion of affected crabbedness, of wanton surliness. If he had not turned his attention to music, he would probably have been a formidable chess player or the honored President of a Zetetic Society.

It is a long time—nearly 10 years—since the "King Stephen" overture was heard at a Symphony concert. This King Stephen is not the King Stephen of the old ballad sung by Iago, who was a worthy peer, and "whose breeches cost him but a crown." And yet the music of the one is not worth much more than the breeches of the other.

PHILIP HALE,

Music is again but strife and contention. There is talk, it seems, against Mr. Paur, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, just as there was talk against the gentlemen who preceded him, Messrs. Henschel, Gerlicke, Nikisch. A conductor is not only a man who governs an orchestra by a stick; he draws toward him the lightning of comment and criticism. But there is no lightning in this present attack. Trains of gunpowder have been slyly laid, but there is smoldering, there is sputtering, rather than any fierce explosion.

The critics are in singular harmony, and they praise this leader. The audiences applauded heartily. Who, pray, are the discontented? Are they young composers whose pieces do not seem to Mr. Paur worthy of performance? Are they members of the orchestra who have been justly corrected for tardiness or indifference at rehearsals? Is there, possibly, one that aspires ambitiously to the very position now held by Mr. Paur?

It appears that Mr. Paur is a fine fellow and an excellent musician, but, alas, he is not "magnetic." He filled positions in Europe with honor; but, alas, he is not "magnetic." Under his direction the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays exceedingly well; but, alas, he is not "magnetic." If he were only a horse-shoe magnet of science, or the loadstone mountain that wrecked the third Royal Calender, or even the toy magnet dear to children; then, all would be well.

In olden times the loadstone was worshiped as a god; in modern times the loadstone-conductor worships himself. There was an ancient belief that iron statues were suspended in the air by help of loadstones; and the wonder at the suspension dulled acute consideration of the worth of the statue. When the loadstones were removed, the statue fell, and there was merely broken iron. Now, Mr. Nikisch was such a magnet, and the orchestra under him was the statue. A "magnetic" conductor is a dangerous thing.

Or possibly the objection against Mr. Paur is that he does not please certain individuals in New York. But was he not hired to please chiefly the audiences of Boston?

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Harold The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mlle. Trebelli.

The Bostonians in "Robin Hood"—
"Tabasco" Still Popular—Tonight's
Attractions—Singers for Carney Hospital—Mr. and Mrs. Paur's Recitals
—The Actors' Fund Benefit—Notes.

Conductor Paur found an opportunity to again recognize the Boston musicians, whom he has dealt with so generously during the season, at last evening's Symphony concert. In affording another hearing of John Knowles Paine's prelude to the "Edipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, opus 35, Mr. Paur gratified a long-desired wish of those who enjoyed a hearing of the music composed by Prof. Paine for the tragedy when it was performed at Harvard University in 1881. Like all of the music by this composer, the "Edipus" prelude commands the respect and admiration of musical students. The mastery of the best forms of orchestral writing which it shows the composer to possess can but be recognized, and the treatment of the themes commands the approval of the most critical. The prelude was splendidly played by Mr. Paur and his musicians, and its performance was greatly enjoyed, the applause following it being finally quieted by an acknowledgement from the composer, who modestly rose in his seat on the floor to do so.

The symphony of the evening was the fourth of the Brahms series, and the tendencies of this composer toward his more melodious epoch, as shown in this composition, was again fully appreciated in its performance. Mr. Paur's reading of the several movements was admirable in every way, and caused general gratification to the followers of "Beethoven's successor."

The soloist of the evening was Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli, who chose the recitative and aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" for Donna Anna, "Non mi Dir" and an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade" for her numbers. It would be very pleasant to commend the singing of Mme. Trebelli and to return the compliments paid to American singers in their concert appearances in London. This, unfortunately, cannot be done with truth or justice to the rising singers of the day. Mme. Trebelli has a very pleasant, musical voice, which she uses with good taste and with correct method. Her singing is, however, amateurish, her tones uncertain, and she shows in her vocal work a lack of finish which is especially noticeable in such selections as she chose for her appearance last evening. She found her audience kindly disposed toward her, however, and met with a pleasant reception and approving applause.

The programme was ended with Beethoven's brilliant overture to "King Stephen," which was capably played and left the audience in a very happy frame of mind.

The season's series of concerts ends next Saturday evening with a programme which includes "The Huldigung's March," "The Mephisto" waltz, Schubert's overture to "Genoveva" and the sixth of the Beethoven symphonies.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

She Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli Sings at the Symphony—Testimonial to Mrs. Benzing—Music Notes.

The 13th season of the symphony concerts is drawing to a close, the rehearsal and concert this week completing the series for 93-94. Last week's program contained one novelty, Prof. J. K. Paine's prelude to "Edipus Tyrannus," given for the first time here. Mlle. Trebelli sang the letter aria from "Don Giovanni" and the bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and the orchestra played Brahms' fourth symphony and Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen." Prof. Paine's work is a solemn and scholarly composition which is interesting only to the expert and advanced student of music, for its severely classical style, so admirably fitting its subject, does not appeal to the tastes of concert patrons in general.

The orchestration is admirable, its treatment broad and effective and thoroughly in keeping with the Sophocles text, which admits of no triviality. The reading by Mr. Paur was conscientious, and evidently in accordance with the ideas of the composer.

Mlle. Trebelli's voice is very pleasing, and she sings easily and generally true. There is a suggestion of reserve strength about her vocalizing which begets confidence in her powers, and her stage presence is very prepossessing and free from mannerisms. Her bravura passages were executed clearly and smoothly, her upper register is sweet, while the lower notes, though not broad, are of even quality and apparently need but experience to develop in warmth and resonance. Her reception must have been very flattering to the young artist, the audience recalling her to the platform several times after each number.

Brahms' fourth symphony, abounding in peculiar and inharmonious modulations, was generally well played. The difficult parts allotted the strings were clearly and smoothly performed throughout the four movements. The melody given to the violas, bassoons and violins in the last part of the second movement was beautifully expressed, and the joyous character of the allegro giocoso was well sustained. The cross-relations between naturals and sharps, which are chaos to the ear, were effectively set forth.

Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen" is simply and generally brilliant, with marked gypsy characteristics in its treatment. The prominence given the wind instruments in the composition is notable, and the body did commendable work, especially in the foot passages in themes of the gypsy nature.

The program for this week will be as follows: Huldigung's march, Wagner; waltz, "Mephisto," Liszt; overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; symphony No. 6, Beethoven.

The Symphony Concert. Scuttle

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, was, Prelude to "Edipus," op 35, J. K. Paine; aria, "Non mi dir," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, E-minor, op 88, Brahms; Aria, "Il est bon il est doux" Massenet; Overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven. Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli was the soloist. The audience was large and very enthusiastic. Mr. Paine's noble and classic prelude that so fitly and so sympathetically ushers in the tragedy for which it was written, was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is a splendid composition in every way, dignified and poetic in sentiment and of peculiar beauty in its harmonic and orchestral treatment. It was applauded with great fervor, and the audience did not cease until the composer, who was present, rose and bowed his acknowledgments. The Brahms symphony was read with fine brilliancy by Mr. Paur; in truth, the interpretation was unlike any that the work has ever had here, and made it clearer and more interesting to us than it ever seemed before. It was beautifully played throughout, the effect of Mr. Paur's careful discipline being notably evident in the strings, which he has brought up to their best efficiency in the past, and to which he has imparted a greater fire and sweep than they have ever had. The performance was sturdily applauded, and Mr. Paur was recalled several times. In fact, the audience through the whole concert was lavish in its applause for the conductor. Mlle. Trebelli was cordially received and made a very favorable impression. She has a full and sympathetic soprano voice of fine quality and extensive range, and she sings with skill and knowledge, showing careful and admirable training in all she does. The Mozart air was sung broadly, with artistic phrasing and perfect tunefulness, and with a method and a style in which it would be difficult to find a fault. In the Massenet air, she was even more successful, and her reading of it was particularly notable for its propriety of dramatic expression. Mlle. Trebelli sings without effort, and is a solid, serviceable vocalist generally, judged by her performances of last night. She was recalled twice after each effort. The programme for the next and last concert of the season, is Huldigung's March, Wagner; Mephisto Waltz, Liszt; Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Symphony No. 6, Beethoven.

MUSIC. Scuttle

Still Kicking.

Some of the New York music critics continue to object to Mr. Paur. One of these writers inveighed at great length against him in last Sunday's Times, and took occasion to comment forcibly, but civilly, on what has appeared in the GAZETTE on the subject. The trend of his argument, however, is chiefly a defence of Mr. Nikisch. He concedes frankly that the orchestra deteriorated under Mr. Nikisch, but seems to think that this was atoned for by the "conductor's search after other and—in his mind—more important things." As far as our experience in Boston may be taken as evidence of Mr. Nikisch's "more important things," they were principally confined to the imparting of an operatic color to everything he conducted. The Times writer, in dwelling on the orchestra under Mr. Gericke, says: "The irresistible snap and incisiveness that were noted when Mr. Gericke first brought the orchestra here, are gone," whereas, if there was anything that the orchestra's playing under Mr. Gericke lacked, it was "snap and incisiveness." There were wonderful precision, finish and clearness, following a discipline that never relaxed; but, despite its technical beauty, the performances were pedagogic in effect. Of "snap" there was nothing. Mr. Nikisch had "snap," and subjugated all the proprieties to it. With all due respect to those New York critics who are so excited over Mr. Paur, we feel that it is not possible that they can know as much about him and his skill as a conductor, as is known by the music critics of Boston; firstly, because the latter have had the experience of twenty-two concerts directed by him, while the New Yorkers have only heard him at some half-dozen, more or less; and, secondly, because the Boston critics are fully as well, if not better, equipped to pass judgment on such matters as are the men of New York. We have had six months of Mr. Paur, and in that time he has restored the orchestra to the efficiency it lost under the showy and unconscientious control of Mr. Nikisch, who was more concerned for himself than for the music he attempted to interpret. Not only this, but under Mr. Paur the orchestra plays with greater warmth, brilliancy, incisiveness and fluency than have ever before attended its performances. The consensus of critical opinion here supports these facts. That criticism which can accept the sickly sentimental readings of Mr. Nikisch in preference to the manly readings of Mr. Paur, speaks its own worthlessness. The Times writer seems to think that the GAZETTE has objected to unfavorable discussion of Mr. Paur by the New York critics. If so, he is in error. What the GAZETTE objects to is the injustice with which Mr. Paur has been treated in New York, and to the apparent determination that exists there to "down him" at any cost. The sincerity and the value of New York musical criticism are not set at a very high rate in Boston, for various unpleasant reasons on which it would be painful to dwell. When it combines in a concerted attack on an artist, and treats him with insulting arrogance, after he has met with favor in a community that is quite as musical as is New York, and quite as capable of judging music and its performances, the inevitable conclusion here is, that there is considerable axe-grinding under way for somebody. Discuss Mr. Paur, by all means, but at least have the discretion to refrain from setting up such twaddling conducting as that of Mr. Nikisch as a standard by which to judge him.

Some of the statements in the Times are remarkable. For instance, it says: "The fact is, that ability as a disciplinarian is not all that is required in a conductor. Neither will intelligent study be sufficient. There must be some musical temperament which can communicate its warmth to the men of the orchestra. Mr. Paur has not shown anything of this kind." But, that is just what he has shown. He has musical temperament, and has communicated its warmth to the men of the orchestra, for, as we have said, they have not, under any previous conductor, played with so much warmth. The performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, last week, bore ample evidence to that fact, and, in the whole existence of the orchestra, it has never done warmer or more perfect work. When the Times says

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert, Soloist Mlle. Trebelli.

The Bostonians in "Robin Hood"—
"Tabasco" Still Popular—Tonight's
Attractions—Singers for Carney Hospital—Mr. and Mrs. Paur's Recitals
—The Actors' Fund Benefit—Notes.

Conductor Paur found an opportunity to again recognize the Boston musicians, whom he has dealt with so generously during the season, at last evening's Symphony concert. In affording another hearing of John Knowles Paine's prelude to the "Edipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, opus 35, Mr. Paur gratified a long-desired wish of those who enjoyed a hearing of the music composed by Prof. Paine for the tragedy when it was performed at Harvard University in 1881. Like all of the music by this composer, the "Edipus" prelude commands the respect and admiration of musical students. The mastery of the best forms of orchestral writing which it shows the composer to possess can but be recognized, and the treatment of the themes commands the approval of the most critical. The prelude was splendidly played by Mr. Paur and his musicians, and its performance was greatly enjoyed, the applause following it being finally quieted by an acknowledgement from the composer, who modestly rose in his seat on the floor to do so.

The symphony of the evening was the fourth of the Brahms series, and the tendencies of this composer toward his more melodious epoch, as shown in this composition, was again fully appreciated in its performance. Mr. Paur's reading of the several movements was admirable in every way, and caused general gratification to the followers of "Beethoven's successor."

The soloist of the evening was Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli, who chose the recitative and aria from Mozart's "Don Giovanni" for Donna Anna, "Non mi Dir" and an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade" for her numbers. It would be very pleasant to commend the singing of Mme. Trebelli and to return the compliments paid to American singers in their concert appearances in London. This, unfortunately, cannot be done with truth or justice to the rising singers of the day. Mme. Trebelli has a very pleasant, musical voice, which she uses with good taste and with correct method. Her singing is, however, amateurish, her tones uncertain, and she shows in her vocal work a lack of finish which is especially noticeable in such selections as she chose for her appearance last evening. She found her audience kindly disposed toward her, however, and met with a pleasant reception and approving applause.

The programme was ended with Beethoven's brilliant overture to "King Stephen," which was capably played and left the audience in a very happy frame of mind.

The season's series of concerts ends next Saturday evening with a programme which includes "The Huldigungs March," "The Mephisto" waltz, Schubert's overture to "Genoveva" and the sixth of the Beethoven symphonies.

CONCERTS AND LECTURES.

Mlle Antoinette Trebelli Sings at the Symphony—Testimonial to Mrs Benzing—Music Notes.

The 13th season of the symphony concerts is drawing to a close, the rehearsal and concert this week completing the series for 93-94. Last week's program contained one novelty, Prof. J. K. Paine's prelude to "Edipus Tyrannus," given for the first time here. Mlle Trebelli sang the letter aria from "Don Giovanni" and the bolero from Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," and the orchestra played Brahms's fourth symphony and Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen." Prof. Paine's work is a solemn and scholarly composition which is interesting only to the expert and advanced student of music, for its severely classical style, so admirably fitting its subject, does not appeal to the tastes of concert patrons in general.

The orchestration is admirable, its treatment broad and effective and thoroughly in keeping with the Sophocles text, which admits of no triviality. The reading by Mr. Paur was conscientious, and evidently in accordance with this idea of the composer.

Mlle Trebelli's voice is very pleasing, and she sings easily and generally true. There is a suggestion of reserve strength about her vocalizing which begets confidence in her powers, and her stage presence is very prepossessing and free from mannerisms. Her bravura passages were executed clearly and smoothly, her upper register is sweet, while the lower notes, though not broad, are of even quality and apparently need but experience to develop in warmth and resonance. Her reception must have been very flattering to the young artist, the audience recalling her to the platform several times after each number.

Brahms's fourth symphony, abounding in peculiar and inharmonious modulations, was generally well played. The difficult parts allotted the strings were clearly and smoothly performed throughout the four movements. The melody given to the violas, bassoons and violins in the last part of the second movement was beautifully expressed, and the joyous character of the allegro giocoso was well sustained. The cross-relations between naturals and sharps, which are chaos to the ear, were effectively set forth.

Beethoven's overture to "King Stephen" is simply and generally brilliant, with marked gypsy characteristics in its treatment. The prominence given the wind instruments in the composition is notable, and the body did commendable work, especially in the foot passages in themes of the gypsy nature.

The program for this week will be as follows: Huldigungs march, Wagner; waltz, "Mephisto," Liszt; overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; symphony No. 6, Beethoven.

The Symphony Concert. South

The programme for last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall, was, Prelude to "Edipus," op 35, J. K. Paine; aria, "Non mi dir," Mozart; Symphony No. 4, E-minor, op 98, Brahms; Aria, "Il est bon il est doux" Massenet; Overture, "King Stephen," Beethoven; Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli was the soloist. The audience was large and very enthusiastic. Mr. Paine's noble and classic prelude that so fitly and so sympathetically ushers in the tragedy for which it was written, was heard again with genuine pleasure. It is a splendid composition in every way, dignified and poetic in sentiment and of peculiar beauty in its harmonic and orchestral treatment. It was applauded with great fervor, and the audience did not cease until the composer, who was present, rose and bowed his acknowledgments. The Brahms symphony was read with fine brilliancy by Mr. Paur; in truth, the interpretation was unlike any that the work has ever had here, and made it clearer and more interesting to us than it ever seemed before. It was beautifully played throughout, the effect of Mr. Paur's careful discipline being notably evident in the strings, which he has brought up to their best efficiency in the past, and to which he has imparted a greater fire and sweep than they have ever had. The performance was sturdily applauded, and Mr. Paur was recalled several times. In fact, the audience through the whole concert was lavish in its applause for the conductor. Mlle. Trebelli was cordially received and made a very favorable impression. She has a full and sympathetic soprano voice of fine quality and extensive range, and she sings with skill and knowledge, showing careful and admirable training in all she does. The Mozart air was sung broadly, with artistic phrasing and perfect tunefulness, and with a method and a style in which it would be difficult to find a fault. In the Massenet air, she was even more successful, and her reading of it was particularly notable for its propriety of dramatic expression. Mlle. Trebelli sings without effort, and is a solid, serviceable vocalist generally, judged by her performances of last night. She was recalled twice after each effort. The programme for the next and last concert of the season, is Huldigungs March, Wagner; Mephisto Waltz, Liszt; Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Symphony No. 6, Beethoven.

MUSIC. South

Still Kicking.

Some of the New York music critics continue to object to Mr. Paur. One of these writers inveighed at great length against him in last Sunday's Times, and took occasion to comment forcibly, but civilly, on what has appeared in the GAZETTE on the subject. The trend of his argument, however, is chiefly a defence of Mr. Nikisch. He concedes frankly that the orchestra deteriorated under Mr. Nikisch, but seems to think that this was atoned for by the "conductor's search after other and—in his mind—more important things." As far as our experience in Boston may be taken as evidence of Mr. Nikisch's "more important things," they were principally confined to the imparting of an operatic color to everything he conducted. The Times writer, in dwelling on the orchestra under Mr. Gericke, says: "The irresistible snap and incisiveness that were noted when Mr. Gericke first brought the orchestra here, are gone," whereas, if there was anything that the orchestra's playing under Mr. Gericke lacked, it was "snap and incisiveness." There were wonderful precision, finish and clearness, following a discipline that never relaxed; but, despite its technical beauty, the performances were pedagogic in effect. Of "snap" there was nothing. Mr. Nikisch had "snap," and subjugated all the proprieties to it. With all due respect to those New York critics who are so excited over Mr. Paur, we feel that it is not possible that they can know as much about him and his skill as a conductor, as is known by the music critics of Boston; firstly, because the latter have had the experience of twenty-two concerts directed by him, while the New Yorkers have only heard him at some half-dozen, more or less; and, secondly, because the Boston critics are fully as well, if not better, equipped to pass judgment on such matters as are the men of New York. We have had six months of Mr. Paur, and in that time he has restored the orchestra to the efficiency it lost under the showy and unconscientious control of Mr. Nikisch, who was more concerned for himself than for the music he attempted to interpret. Not only this, but under Mr. Paur the orchestra plays with greater warmth, brilliancy, incisiveness and fluency than have ever before attended its performances. The consensus of critical opinion here supports these facts. That criticism which can accept the sickly sentimental readings of Mr. Nikisch in preference to the manly readings of Mr. Paur, speaks its own worthlessness. The Times writer seems to think that the GAZETTE has objected to unfavorable discussion of Mr. Paur by the New York critics. If so, he is in error. What the GAZETTE objects to is the injustice with which Mr. Paur has been treated in New York, and to the apparent determination that exists there to "down him" at any cost. The sincerity and the value of New York musical criticism are not set at a very high rate in Boston, for various unpleasant reasons on which it would be painful to dwell. When it combines in a concerted attack on an artist, and treats him with insulting arrogance, after he has met with favor in a community that is quite as musical as is New York, and quite as capable of judging music and its performances, the inevitable conclusion here is, that there is considerable axe-grinding under way for somebody. Discuss Mr. Paur, by all means, but at least have the discretion to refrain from setting up such twaddling conducting as that of Mr. Nikisch as a standard by which to judge him.

Some of the statements in the Times are remarkable. For instance, it says: "The fact is, that ability as a disciplinarian is not all that is required in a conductor. Neither will intelligent study be sufficient. There must be some musical temperament which can communicate its warmth to the men of the orchestra. Mr. Paur has not shown anything of this kind." But that is just what he has shown. He has musical temperament, and has communicated its warmth to the men of the orchestra, for, as we have said, they have not, under any previous conductor, played with so much warmth. The performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, last week, bore ample evidence to that fact, and, in the whole existence of the orchestra, it has never done warmer or more perfect work. When the Times says 276 that the orchestra "plays smoothly, correctly, glibly, if you will, but with deadly dullness," it shows that the writer is not filled with the spirit of fairness. Nor is it any potent argument against the capacity of Boston to judge of a conductor's efficiency, by referring slipshodly to her "provincial limits." By and by the New York critics will recover from the malady of Nikischitis under which they are at present suffering, and then they will be clearer in judgment, even if they should not be fairer in spirit.

The Times has, at least, conducted its argument with dignity. Not so the Musical Courier, which returned, last week, to the attack on Mr. Paur, with all the bitterness and the offensive personalities that have characterized its treatment of Mr. Paur from the outset. Not only this, but it adheres to the misrepresentations in which it has steadily indulged. However, it is something in the nature of a compliment to be abused by the Courier, and its power to do injury is immeasurably, almost ludicrously out of proportion to its gleeful eagerness to work it. Without any hesitation, it announces that "Mr. Higginson has grown very tired of his new man." And yet we doubt if Mr. Higginson has taken the Courier into his confidence. The Courier is probably indebted for its information to some one or more of the disgruntled violinists who have busied themselves in inveighing against Mr. Paur in return for the discipline to which he has subjected them. It repeats its offensive flat: "Mr. Paur must go," evidently firm in the faith that New York, as represented by the Courier, is all powerful in Boston. We are told, "New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go!" New York is less influential here than is imagined by the Courier, for according to that veracious and highly respectable periodical, New York did want Arthur Nikisch,—and yet Arthur Nikisch's services were willingly dispensed with, and musical Boston has not given as much as one sigh for his departure. We are afraid that the Musical Courier is not yet in a position to cause Mr. Paur's dismissal. The wonder of it all is that New York should be so agitated over Mr. Paur. That city has Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Seidl, and is likely to have Mr. Theodore Thomas. It would seem that, in its wealth of conductors of its own, it had enough to attend to without troubling itself so greatly about Boston's conductor. Perhaps New York does not trouble itself, after all, and that all this pother by a few music critics, is of a limited, personal nature, rather than an expression of general opinion. It is not long since these writers decided that Walter Damrosch "must go;" and yet that gentleman is still at the fore. They have entered upon a combined opposition to Theodore Thomas, and yet the indications are that they will fail to write him down. Something must be wrong. Can it be that these writers are not so very influential, after all?

AMERICAN MUSIC.

Trans.

A Fine Treat Provided at the Twenty-third Symphony.

PRELUDE TO OEDIPUS

Prof. Paine's Immortal Music Grandly Rendered.

Mr. Paur's Work Received with the Most Intense Enthusiasm.

The programme of the 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Prelude to "Oedipus,".....J. K. Paine
Recitative and Aria, "Crudele! Ah No Mio bene!"
from Don Juan.....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
Aria from "Herodiade," Il est bon, il est doux,
.....Massenet
Overture, "King Stephen,".....Beethoven
Miss Antoinette Trebelli was the soloist.

It was gratifying to hear something played from the works of the greatest American composer, and to hear it played in so masterly a manner.

Never before has the nobility, the tragic power, the poetic sentiment and the lofty inspiration of Prof. Paine's immortal "Prelude" been brought forth with such startling vividness and overpowering effect as through the comprehensive grasp of Conductor Paur's reading and the wonderfully accurate delineation of his conception in its perfect rendering on this occasion.

It takes a musician of that broad and capacious mind, that depth of feeling and that artistic discernment possessed by Conductor Paur to encompass the magnitude of such a composition, to realize its classic purity, and through a just appreciation thereby to display its eminent characteristics.

Never before in the history of this superb orchestra has it surpassed, if equalled, the effect gained in the performance of this classic and inspired composition. Mr. Paur was recalled three or four times to respond to the enthusiastic applause of the audience, which applause did not cease until Prof. Paine, who was in the audience, arose and bowed his acknowledgment of his fellow-town-men's appreciation. This wonderful interpretation upon the part of Conductor Paur causes those who have proper appreciation of Prof. Paine's eminent genius to all the more desire that others of his equally praiseworthy compositions may find a place in Conductor Paur's programmes in future, in order that their value may be better realized and their beauties enhanced through his artistic conception and masterly interpretation.

Prof. Paine's works are upon the highest plane of classic composition and stand side by side with the works of Beethoven and Schumann. With the aid of such an exposition of their worth as Conductor Paur gave us in the rendering of the "Prelude," his audiences, unacquainted with the high value of Prof. Paine's compositions, would at once recognize the pre-eminence of their countryman's genius and appreciate it sufficiently to honor him as one of whom, in the realms of highest musical art, any nation may well be proud.

The Brahms Symphony is a work of great science and little contrast. Its themes are worked out with that profound knowledge, that contrapuntal skill and that unflagging zeal identical with its famous composer. There is an absence of color in the instrumentation, which, with the want of contrast in movements, serves much in destroying the listeners' interest. One also becomes weary with the overpowering sound that constantly prevails, especially in the third and fourth movements. Although a marvel of clearness and excellence in the playing, under Mr. Paur's baton, on the whole, it must be considered as a rather too robust performance.

The overture of "King Stephen" is hardly worthy a place upon a programme in these days. It would be no loss to art if both it and the "Dedication of the House" overture were shelved for all time. The cause of true art would not suffer thereby.

Miss Trebelli, the vocalist, is the daughter of the former famous opera singers, the late Mme. Trebelli, the contralto, and Sig. Bettini, the latter a renowned tenor, who, in company with Bosio and Badiali, was heard in Italian opera in Boston during the fifties.

Miss Trebelli has a clear and telling voice, but its quality is made hard and inflexible by her manner of producing it. The middle tones are liable to sink backward in the mouth and become a fragment below the pitch, while nearly all the high tones are forced. Her singing too often lacks flow, and sometimes the tones are "scraped" out of her throat. The top notes are generally thin and strident, and her style is spasmodic in its effort. Neither was her articulation to be commended. All these discrepancies rendered her performance rather dry and inexpressive. Much might have been done with such a good voice, such evident musical intelligence, and natural facility of execution, had its cultivation been differently directed.

277 The audience was enthusiastic with its applause and Miss Trebelli was recalled several times after each piece.

Mr. Paur, conducted the accompaniments in a most skillful and discreet manner, thereby aiding the singer at every point.

Next Saturday the 24th and last concert of this season's series will be given, with the following programme: Wagner's Huldigungs March; Liszt's Mephisto Waltz; Schumann's overture, "Genoveva" and Beethoven's Sixth Symphony.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MORE OF MR. PAUR.

The New York Musical Courier has had another lapse in the sanity of its career in the recurrence of its aberration shouts from its housetop that "New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go."

Our esteemed contemporary might just as well keep cool and let his hair grow, for Mr. Paur will go, that is, go on conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next four seasons, regardless of the fact that the Courier and other New York critics do not appreciate his superior ability as an orchestral conductor.

We much fear that the extravagances and vulgarities of those inferior conductors and eminent noise defenders, Seidl and Nikisch, have served in vitiating the taste of our brother scribes in Gotham until their critical judgment has had a stroke of paralysis.

Well, gentlemen, dwell together in peace and harmony until Mr. Paur comes over to you again next autumn with his superb band rid of the inferior players that Nikisch's incompetency was the means of placing within its ranks, and you will have a good opportunity to improve your taste, and your critical judgment as well, in listening to the magnificent models of orchestral playing that will be vouchsafed you under the guidance of Mr. Paur's superior ability as an orchestral conductor. You might as well throw away your axes, gentlemen, as far as Mr. Higginson's grindstone is concerned, for it is not at all at your command in any effort upon your part to sharpen their edges in your hunt for the scalp of Conductor Paur.

—The silly cabal against Paur, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, is interesting everybody in Boston just now. There are two sides to every question, and this case, presumably, is no exception to the general rule, unless it be the exception that goes to prove it. The fact of the matter is, that Mr. Paur is a disciplinarian, and certain curled darlings of the orchestra are disgruntled at what they call his "intolerance and overbearing." Mr. "Tim" Adamowski's winter plumage—that second consignment of spring habiliments not yet having arrived—has been sadly ruffled since he was told rather gruffly the other day to "sit up and play like a man." Now, "Tim," the blond and beautiful, does not know how to play like a man—he plays like an angel. And therefore, presumably, angels slouch while performing symphonies in the celestial choir. "Tim's" G string, thus strained beyond endurance, snapped, and demoralization reigned supreme for the nonce. Mr. Kneisel, of the quartet, was not present when Mr. Adamowski received his reprimand and broke his G string, so that he could not hold the hand of his friend in a mute promise of that the orchestra "plays smoothly, correctly, glibly, if you will, but with deadly dullness," it shows that the writer is not filled with the spirit of fairness. Nor is it any potent argument against the capacity of Boston to judge of a conductor's efficiency, by referring flippantly to her "provincial limits." By and by the New York critics will recover from the malady of Nikischitis under which they are at present suffering, and then they will be clearer in judgment, even if they should not be fairer in spirit.

The Times has, at least, conducted its argument with dignity. Not so the Musical Courier, which returned, last week, to the attack on Mr. Paur, with all the bitterness and the offensive personalities that have characterized its treatment of Mr. Paur from the outset. Not only this, but it adheres to the misrepresentations in which it has steadily indulged. However, it is something in the nature of a compliment to be abused by the Courier, and its power to do injury is immeasurably, almost ludicrously out of proportion to its gleeful eagerness to work it. Without any hesitation, it announces that "Mr. Higginson has grown very tired of his new man." And yet we doubt if Mr. Higginson has taken the Courier into his confidence. The Courier is probably indebted for its information to some one or more of the disgruntled violinists who have busied themselves in inveighing against Mr. Paur in return for the discipline to which he has subjected them. It repeats its offensive flat: "Mr. Paur must go," evidently firm in the faith that New York, as represented by the Courier, is all powerful in Boston. We are told, "New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go!" New York is less influential here than is imagined by the Courier, for according to that veracious and highly respectable periodical, New York did want Arthur Nikisch,—and yet Arthur Nikisch's services were willingly dispensed with, and musical Boston has not given as much as one sigh for his departure. We are afraid that the Musical Courier is not yet in a position to cause Mr. Paur's dismissal. The wonder of it all is that New York should be so agitated over Mr. Paur. That city has Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Seidl, and is likely to have Mr. Theodore Thomas. It would seem that, in its wealth of conductors of its own, it had enough to attend to without troubling itself so greatly about Boston's conductor. Perhaps New York does not trouble itself, after all, and that all this pother by a few music critics, is of a limited, personal nature, rather than an expression of general opinion. It is not long since these writers decided that Walter Damrosch "must go;" and yet that gentleman is still at the fore. They have entered upon a combined opposition to Theodore Thomas, and yet the indications are that they will fail to write him down. Something must be wrong. Can it be that these writers are not so very influential, after all?

AMERICAN MUSIC.

From

A Fine Treat Provided at the Twenty-third Symphony.

PRELUDE TO OEDIPUS

Prof. Paine's Immortal Music Grandly Rendered.

Mr. Paur's Work Received with the Most Intense Enthusiasm.

The programme of the 23d concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Prelude to "Oedipus,".....J. K. Paine
Recitative and Aria, "Crudele? Ah No Mio bene!"
from Don Juan.....Mozart
Symphony No. 4, in E minor.....Brahms
Aria from "Herodiade," Il est bon, il est doux,
.....Massenet
Overture, "King Stephen,".....Beethoven
Miss Antoinette Trebelli was the soloist.

It was gratifying to hear something played from the works of the greatest American composer, and to hear it played in so masterly a manner.

Never before has the nobility, the tragic power, the poetic sentiment and the lofty inspiration of Prof. Paine's immortal "Prelude" been brought forth with such startling vividness and overpowering effect as through the comprehensive grasp of Conductor Paur's reading and the wonderfully accurate delineation of his conception in its perfect rendering on this occasion.

It takes a musician of that broad and capacious mind, that depth of feeling and that artistic discernment possessed by Conductor Paur to encompass the magnitude of such a composition, to realize its classic purity, and through a just appreciation thereby to display its eminent characteristics.

Never before in the history of this superb orchestra has it surpassed, if equalled, the effect gained in the performance of this classic and inspired composition. Mr. Paur was recalled three or four times to respond to the enthusiastic applause of the audience, which applause did not cease until Prof. Paine, who was in the audience, arose and bowed his acknowledgment of his fellow-townsmen's approbation.

This wonderful interpretation upon the part of Conductor Paur causes those who have proper appreciation of Prof. Paine's eminent genius to all the more desire that others of his equally praiseworthy compositions may find a place in Conductor Paur's programmes in future, in order that their value may be better realized and their beauties enhanced through his artistic conception and masterly interpretation.

Prof. Paine's works are upon the highest plane of classic composition and stand side by side with the works of Beethoven and Schumann. With the aid of such an exposition of their worth as Conductor Paur gave us in the rendering of the "Prelude," his audiences, unacquainted with the high value of Prof. Paine's compositions, would at once recognize the pre-eminence of their countryman's genius and appreciate it sufficiently to honor him as one of whom, in the realms of highest musical art, any nation may well be proud.

The Brahms Symphony is a work of great science and little contrast. Its themes are worked out with that profound knowledge, that contrapuntal skill and that unflagging zeal identical with its famous composer. There is an absence of color in the instrumentation, which, with the want of contrast in movements, serves much in destroying the listeners' interest. One also becomes weary with the overpowering sound that constantly prevails, especially in the third and fourth movements. Although a marvel of clearness and excellence in the playing, under Mr. Paur's baton, on the whole, it must be considered as a rather too robust performance.

The overture of "King Stephen" is hardly worthy a place upon a programme in these days. It would be no loss to art if both it and the "Dedication of the House" overture were shelved for all time. The cause of true art would not suffer thereby.

Miss Trebelli, the vocalist, is the daughter of the former famous opera singers, the late Mme. Trebelli, the contralto, and Sig. Bettini, the latter a renowned tenor, who, in company with Bosio and Badioli, was heard in Italian opera in Boston during the fifties.

Miss Trebelli has a clear and telling voice, but its quality is made hard and inflexible by her manner of producing it. The middle tones are liable to sink backward in the mouth and become a fragment below the pitch, while nearly all the high tones are forced. Her singing too often lacks flow, and sometimes the tones are "scraped" out of her throat. The top notes are generally thin and strident, and her style is spasmodic in its effort. Neither was her articulation to be commended. All these discrepancies rendered her performance rather dry and inexpressive. Much might have been done with such a good voice, such evident musical intelligence, and natural facility of execution, had its cultivation been differently directed.

The audience was enthusiastic with its applause and Miss Trebelli was recalled several times after each piece.

Mr. Paur, conducted the accompaniments in a most skillful and discreet manner, thereby aiding the singer at every point.

Next Saturday the 24th and last concert of this season's series will be given, with the following programme: Wagner's Huldigungs March; Liszt's Mephisto Waltz; Schumann's overture, "Genoveva" and Beethoven's Sixth Symphony.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MORE OF MR. PAUR.

The New York Musical Courier has had another lapse in the sanity of its career in the recurrence of its aberration shouts from its housetop that "New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go."

Our esteemed contemporary might just as well keep cool and let his hair grow, for Mr. Paur will go, that is, go on conducting the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the next four seasons, regardless of the fact that the Courier and other New York critics do not appreciate his superior ability as an orchestral conductor.

We much fear that the extravagances and vulgarities of those inferior conductors and eminent noise defenders, Seidl and Nikisch, have served in vitiating the taste of our brother scribes in Gotham until their critical judgment has had a stroke of paralysis.

Well, gentlemen, dwell together in peace and harmony until Mr. Paur comes over to you again next autumn with his superb band rid of the inferior players that Nikisch's incompetency was the means of placing within its ranks, and you will have a good opportunity to improve your taste, and your critical judgment as well, in listening to the magnificent models of orchestral playing that will be vouchsafed you under the guidance of Mr. Paur's superior ability as an orchestral conductor. You might as well throw away your axes, gentlemen, as far as Mr. Higginson's grindstone is concerned, for it is not at all at your command in any effort upon your part to sharpen their edges in your hunt for the scalp of Conductor Paur.

—The silly cabal against Paur, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, is interesting everybody in Boston just now. There are two sides to every question, and this case, presumably, is no exception to the general rule, unless it be the exception that goes to prove it. The fact of the matter is, that Mr. Paur is a disciplinarian, and certain curled darlings of the orchestra are disgruntled at what they call his "intolerance and overbearing." Mr. "Tim" Adamowski's winter plumage—that second consignment of spring habiliments not yet having arrived—has been sadly ruffled since he was told rather gruffly the other day to "sit up and play like a man." Now, "Tim," the blond and beautiful, does not know how to play like a man—he plays like an angel. And therefore, presumably, angels slouch while performing symphonies in the celestial choir. "Tim's" G string, thus strained beyond endurance, snapped, and demoralization reigned supreme for the nonce. Mr. Kneisel, of the quartet, was not present when Mr. Adamowski received his reprimand and broke his G string, so that he could not hold the hand of his friend in a mute promise of "brotherly love." Just as soon as Mr. Kneisel did get to the rehearsal he was fined for being "systematically late." Fined—and he of The quartet, too! At this every string of Timothée's Stradivarius parted simultaneously, and these two petted "first violins" vowed vengeance. There has followed a succession of stories about and criticism of their leader, and this, unfortunately, not without some result, for the mischief makers contrive to carry, with their pretty manners and dainty affectations, a certain weight in fashionable quarters. These malcontents, only three or four in number, lose no opportunity to disparage Mr. Paur in the most cruel way; and it seems to me that, under the existing circumstances, the most advisable course to pursue would be to permit them, if they so wish, to find places with other conductors, where their "How d'y do, dear boy," ebullitions would receive fuller approval. Mr. Paur has the respect and esteem of the whole orchestra, and the onus of this absurd orchestral cabal against him can be traced and laid to these over-fêted "violins," and to one or two young composers, who likewise enjoy momentarily the caresses and smiles of some fashionable mondaines, whose music has not been performed, and who are chagrined by the discovery that they cannot "jolly" Mr. Paur after the fashion in which they pampered Mr. Nikisch.—Town Topics.

278

MR. PAUR AS A LION.

Journal — Apr. 15-74
It was said of late that there would be greater interest in the Symphony concerts if the conductor, Mr. Paur, were a social lion, and it is believed by many that it is Mr. Paur's duty to art to be prominent at teas, lunches, dinners, receptions and other forms of social entertainments or functions. In other words, the proposition is made in all seriousness that excellence as a musician must be supplemented by parlor-reputation; that the dignity of the office depends on the frequency and the acceptance of pasteboard invitations. Unless the conductor is a recognized factor in social life, the orchestra will have no "social standing," and it will soon be unfashionable to attend the concerts.

To the visitor from Mars such a musical condition in Boston would smack of opera bouffe, and he might naturally inquire into the sincerity of the cultivators of the art. If he were told in addition that the purpose of the generous founder of these concerts was to give at a low price orchestral music performed by an excellent orchestra to the music-loving people of Boston; that this purpose had been of late years thwarted by the desire of many, who looked on the concerts as an opportunity for fashionable display, to raise the price of the tickets to an extravagant height; that the moment a conductor of acknowledged musical ability was engaged, there was more talk concerning his habits and costume than his musical fitness for the position; the visitor from Mars would undoubtedly shrug his shoulders, but not offensively, and say to himself, "Bless my soul, what queer people!"

Now Mr. Paur has a family. He has a pleasant home in Jamaica Plain. When he is through with the exhausting labor of rehearsal, or when the excitement of a concert is over, he is glad to leave the town behind him and rest quietly within the walls of his own dwelling-house. Is he a less competent conductor on this account? Is his knowledge of Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, the less because he prefers slippers and a pipe to the formality of evening dress and the fatigue of forced conversation?

Mr. Paur, as he is, appears to be a more dignified figure than Mr. Paur as he should be, according to the definition of the lion hunters. Should he be forced to play the lion and roar, he would be often in parlous state. Pitfalls and gins would be prepared for him. His roar would be misunderstood and misrepresented. Young composers would find him fair game and chase him under the chandelier. Before the season were over the hunters would long for a fresh lion and talk of a new conductor.

Now, if the Symphony concerts really depend on the social success of the conductor, the sooner they are abandoned the better for musical righteousness in this city. These concerts have only gratified a fleeting desire, the sooner they are given up the better for art. But we should be slow to believe that the organization of this great institution, which is indeed an honor to the town, rests on such flimsy foundations.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert.

With the echoes of "Phormio" still in the air, it was peculiarly appropriate to listen to the prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus," and to be reminded by the grandeur of the measures that comedy cannot be the peer of tragedy, and the Terence cannot inspire the composer as Sophocles has done. It served also to remind the auditor that in spite of the rapidly increasing number of American composers Prof. Paine is still Primus inter Pares. It is the writer's opinion that in "Oedipus Tyrannus" American music reached its high-water mark for the present, that no native composition may be ranked with it in dignity or sustained power. It was given an ultra-dramatic reading, perhaps a more fiery interpretation than it demanded, but it made a great impression upon the audience, and the applause was continuous until the composer had bowed his thanks to orchestra and audience from his seat in the hall.

Then followed the "Letter Aria" from "Don Giovanni" brilliantly sung by Mlle. Antoinette Trebelli. The singer has a full voice of very agreeable timbre, and she uses it well; her intonation is good, she has conquered agilità, and she is able to give a dramatic breadth to her climaxes; she attacks high notes with decision and surety, yet her lowest register is pure and full-toned, reminding one of Lucca's style in deep passages. There is, however, a lack of complete ripeness, sometimes betraying itself by portamento from high notes, by a weak staccato or an occasional blur. But it must be borne in mind that the critic is applying the most rigid standard and judging the young artist as if she were a Senbrich. She can well sustain such a comparison, and if she has not yet reached the very highest rank she has a good chance of yet doing so. Her unaffected style is greatly to be commended, and her singing of Massenet's "Il est bon, il est doux" won a whole series of recalls.

Brahms' fourth symphony was the Piece de Resistance of the concert. We have had some excellent Brahmsite conductors in Boston; Mr. Henschel was a personal friend of the composer, and his readings had in some degree an authorization from headquarters. Mr. Gercke also was acquainted with the great symphonist and had heard him lead all of his chief works, and therefore his readings were also ex Cathedra, but it is not too much to say that the fourth symphony never had so clear, so interesting an interpretation in Boston as it received at this concert. With the exception of a slight blur caused by the hurry of the first violins, the first movement was admirably clear, the pizzicato effects were most brilliant, and the antiphonal effect of the two-noted figure in the Coda was wrought to a superb climax.

The andante is, to the reviewer's mind, the most attractive movement of the work. At the very start the composer brings in a strange and weird effect by using an unusual scale-formation. Strongly akin to one of the so-called "Gregorian Tones," the progressions used are still to be found in some Hungarian music. Our composers are in search of new flavors to excite the jaded musical palate; they will probably find them in the very old music, either in its original guise, or as it has filtered down to us in the folk-songs of some of the wilder nations of Europe or of the Orient. The scale from E to E, played entirely on the white keys of the piano, would give an approximate idea of the mode used here by Brahms, but it may be stated that St. Saens has written music on a scale which could be similarly played from D to D (again an ancient mode, but also used by Orientals) the Hungarian often employs a scale running, C, D, E flat, F sharp, G, A flat, B and C, and in the Byzantine music, among many quaint formations, one finds the following: C, D flat, E, F, G, A flat, B and C; even the five-toned scale used by Chinese and Scotch, the pentatonic progressions of which can be represented by the black keys of the piano is not without beautiful use, as witness "Auld Lang Syne" and "Bonnie Doon." It is quite possible that such formations take us very near to the music of ancient Greece, and that the evolutions of music are travelling in a circle; however this may be, one cannot but find delight in the charming employment of the unusual mode which Brahms has here used. It speaks as a voice from a half-forgotten past, and might take for its motto Waldan's verse:—

279

"Es klingt in der Luft uralter Sang,
Nicht Jubelruf, nicht Wehgeschrei,
Und doch so suess, und doch so bang,
Als ob er beides sei."

"There sounds in the air an ancient rune,
Not cry of joy nor wail of pain.
And yet so sweet, so sad the tune
As it might be the twain."

The movement was performed without flaw, although the horns seemed a trifle forced in the first announcement of the figure. The Scherzo (or the movement that here stands in place of the conventional Scherzo) has always seemed to the writer the least effective part of the symphony, but it took on a new meaning on this occasion because of the tremendous amount of animal spirits with which Mr. Paur invested it. Bizarre and brusque it was to the last degree, but the orchestra was firm as a rock in every change of tempo or caprice of shading, and the public was quick to recognize the splendid performance by the heartiest applause. The finale scarcely impressed one as greatly as what had gone before. The performance was somewhat too inflated, and there was a vein of bombast apparent. Perhaps this was permissible, since the chief theme was a Passacaglia. This was one of the most pompous of the old dances. It was walked through with lordly strut by the old Spanish grandees. To derive it from "Pasar" and "Calle" ("going along the street") seems wrong when one takes its character into consideration; it might be much more naturally derived from "Passo Gallo" (the "Rooster step"), which would at least be in line with its characteristics. Brahms has followed Beethoven in ending his symphony with variations. Both the great symphonists have found difficulty in inventing a good counterpoise for the strength of the musical form (the Sonata-form) used in the first movement of symphony; the composer of these musical epics is unfortunately forced to play his trump-card first. If there is to be any further development along the lines of Sonata form it will probably be in a change of the order of the movements. Wonderful variations these are, and on the simplest of themes, but they show something of Brahms' phlegmatic nature, which must always trot far behind Beethoven's emotional power.

280

With Beethoven's "King Stephen" overture the concert ended. Iago sang that "King Stephen was a worthy peer" in a rollicking fashion, and there was a good deal of joviality in the finale of the concert of Saturday, even without Shakespearian warrant. The horns and trumpets rang out gloriously, the oboe played its theme with artistic effect, the reading was brilliant, and so, in every respect, was the performance. The programme did not suffer from the awkward arrangement, or inordinate length, that has sometimes militated against full success, and altogether the concert was one which musician and non-musician could unite in thoroughly enjoying and praising.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

281
Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1893-94.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. EMIL PAUR, Conductor.

XXIV. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

SATURDAY, APRIL 28. AT 8. P. M.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER.

HULDIGUNG'S MARSCH.

LISZT.

SCENE IN THE TAVERN. (Mephisto Waltz), from Lenau's "Faust."

SCHUMANN.

OVERTURE. "Genoveva," in C minor, op. 81.

BEETHOVEN.

SYMPHONY No. 6, in F major, (Pastoral), op. 68.

- I. Awakening of cheerful sensations on arriving in the country. Allegro ma non troppo.
- II. Scene by the brook. Andante molto mosso.
- III. Merry meeting of the country folk. Allegro.
In tempo d'Allegretto.
- IV. Thunder-storm. Allegro.
- V. Glad and thankful feelings after the storm. Allegretto.

222
APRIL 25, 1894.

A LOVE FEAST.

Symphony Players Are Not Angry With Mr. Paur.

Messrs. Kneisel and Adamowski Deny New York Stories.

Cause of Rumors Said to Be an Attempt to Make Trouble.

Startling and sensational have been the reports circulated in New York in relation to our own Symphony Orchestra. War is said to exist between Conductor Paur and his principal players.

So interesting and spicy have been these New York reports that certain Boston papers copied them. They took care, however, to credit the clippings.

The stories, upon investigation by the Journal, prove to be merely very clever fictions. Their cleverness lies in the marvelous inventive powers of the authors, whoever they may be.

The latest story relates to those two brilliant violinists—Franz Kneisel and Timothee Adamowski. They are said, in this story, to be the authors of the rumors derogatory to Mr. Paur that have been flying around New York and Boston. The causes of the trouble are said to have been "cell-downs" received from the leader.

The particular story in relation to Mr. Kneisel is that he came in late one day and that Mr. Paur fined him "for being systematically late." Hence, says the fiction writer, Mr. Kneisel's enmity! Enmity, by the way, that does not exist, except in the fertile brain of the afore-said writer.

But, in order that the brilliant and popular violinist might have a chance to accept Priscilla's request and "speak for himself," a Journal man last evening went to Jamaica Plain.

Mr. Kneisel Was Never Fined.

Mr. Kneisel was found at his pretty new home at No. 47 Atherton Street. He was about to start for Cambridge, where his quartette was to appear at a subscription concert.

Mr. Kneisel was shown the clipping in relation to the alleged episode in which he is said to have figured.

"There is not a word of truth in it," said he, hotly. "It is false—it is not so. You ask me if I have been late?" The Journal's representative nodded. "You can say that I have been late but once this winter. That was only 10 minutes, owing to the street car. I came in, and Mr. Paur smiled at me as I took my place in the orchestra. Explanations were not necessary, as he understood I would have come if I could, and it was only 10 minutes. I told him later and he understood. He has never fined me."

223
"Is there good feeling in the orchestra?" asked the Journal reporter.

"Yes. Every man does his duty and plays his best. There is no careless playing. It is just as it always has been. The men work hard and do their best." Mr. Kneisel spoke with much earnestness.

"Do you consider Mr. Paur to be a good conductor?"

In no uncertain tones and with a marked note of sincerity in his voice Mr. Kneisel answered "Yes."

Mr. Adamowski Much Amused.

The members of the Tavern Club were at dinner when the Journal reporter called there last night in search of Mr. "Tim" Adamowski. The clipping, already alluded to, had also said that Mr. Paur had told the charming "Tim" to "sit up and play like a man," which, probably on account of its wrong use of English, is said to have stirred up the versatile violinist to such an extent that he descended to backbiting tactics, which is not his way usually.

Mr. Adamowski came running down stairs as soon as he heard of the Journal man's arrival, and came into the reception room with a warm smile of welcome. He glanced at the clipping and, when he saw its source, laughed and said: "Oh, I pay no attention to that," with amused contempt.

"Then, Mr. Paur never made that remark to you?"

"Never," said the smiling musician, waving his well-cut blonde hair with a vehement shake of the head.

"There is good feeling existing between Mr. Paur and the orchestra?"

Again an amused laugh, and: "Perfectly. When Mr. Paur gave his concerto to-day the orchestra stopped to applaud him and Mrs. Paur."

"It seems absurd to ask, but have you ever circulated reports derogatory to Mr. Paur's skill as a conductor?"

"Never," said Mr. Adamowski, with a frank smile and a quick gesture that was even more expressive of sincere dissent than his words. Then he bid the reporter a cordial adieu, and slipped up stairs again.

An Attempt to Make Trouble.

From further investigations it appears that both men have repeatedly seized upon opportunities to speak well of the conductor. Mr. Kneisel has been particularly kind in this respect, having helped Mr. Paur in a manner that is only now made public, by defending him when he first came here.

The story of the fining of Mr. Kneisel probably springs from the fact that one of the minor players, not one of "the" quartette, was recently fined 50 cents for coming in half an hour late. But it was not Mr. Kneisel. This man had been late before, however.

Someone knowing of this turned it about and applied it to Mr. Kneisel.

Well, the friends of the orchestra say that the whole thing is an attempt to make trouble in the orchestra. Two reasons are assigned for this endeavor—New York jealousy of Boston's vet organization, or else a desire to get Theodore Thomas at the head of the orchestra.

But, judging by the love feast that now seems to be characteristic of the Symphony rehearsals and performances, these "nefarious" attempts are destined to be without fruit.

Boston

Symphony

Orchestra.

Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor.

FOURTEENTH SEASON, 1894-95.

OPENING CONCERT

SATURDAY EVENING,

OCTOBER 13, 1894.

MUSIC.

Journal

The Last Symphony Concert of the Season of '93-'94—The Enthusiastic Applause Awarded Mr. Emil Paur, Conductor.

The program of the 24th Symphony concert, the last of the season of '93-'94, was as follows:
Huldigung's Marsch..... Wagner
Scene in the Tavern—(Mephisto Waltz), from Liszt
Lenau's "Faust"..... Schumann
Overture—"Genoveva"..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 6.....

As Mr. Paur appeared on the stage of Music Hall last evening he was greeted with hearty and long-continued applause. At the end of the concert the great audience recalled him again and again. Seldom has a more flattering tribute been paid any conductor in this city.

This applause was undoubtedly an open manifestation of the appreciation in which this admirable conductor is held in Boston and a public recognition of the faithful work done by him during the past season, rather than the expression of specific delight awakened by the concert itself.

In another column of this issue of the Journal I have discussed the characteristics of Mr. Paur, the conductor. His weakness is a seeming inability to arrange an effective and well-contrasted program. The weakness is not peculiar to him; it was found in Mr. Gericke; it was found in Mr. Nikisch. So far as program-making is concerned, no one of our other Symphony conductors has equaled Mr. Henschel.

And yet the arrangement of the program of last evening shows in a curious way the musical sincerity and modesty of Mr. Paur. Remember that the concert was the last of the season. Now how many conductors would have thought of choosing as the last number the Pastoral Symphony? How many would have been content to dismiss the audience in such a simple manner? Nine out of ten would have said "Come now, we must make a plunge." They would have selected carefully some screaming, wall-shattering, sky-sailing piece, and called in the aid of all the pulsatile instruments known from the time of the Assyrians, who were a people delighting in noise.

The numbers of this program are well known, and they call now for no extended comment. The Pastoral Symphony undoubtedly gives vast pleasure to many, who are thrilled by the mimicry of birds and the trick thunder storm. But at the risk of being charged with blasphemy, may I ask humbly if the second movement is not so interminable that it is almost a musical bore of huge dimensions? And is the Symphony, as a whole, even when it is "illustrated" with real wheelbarrows and simpering ballet girls, as happened once in New York years ago, to be compared for a moment with any of the others of Beethoven, beginning with the third?

Mr. Paur has earned honestly his vacation. May he enjoy it as thoroughly as he accomplishes his musical duties.

The program book states that the opening concert of the 14th season will be given Oct. 13, and that Mr. Emil Paur will be the conductor.

PHILIP HALE.

scribed $1,000 each for a it possible to form an or-o discuss adore Thomas was chosen I wrote a his selection of artists,ressions The orchestra which Mr. r three years' of practice,ymphony e. Artistically, there isnd—The as had met with so many ence of preceding yearsormers is l that he would profit byPère Cas- ere vain; he persisted inr concert gs, would not give the and zeal- en generally antagonistic, and they offered him good advice. it is the f his summer concerts at at home." ue to causes which didf music is ites them.

50 cents, refreshments, intelligent g the intermissions, theelity of a ular character, and therespect his weeks. The Expositionlissipated; e ample room for prome-lease, that l the place was one whereatrical. ease. At the Auditorium eminently eats was $1.50, the pro-an be con- refreshments could bet. As long deficit even larger thanwhich they ear had a deficit nearlynt. nd the season just closedd they are ciation has succeeded inhurch or to season. That there is aommit any ming year successful isey would if nent will take warningovelty, par- es or not is a question.n object of owever, that we are stilleople whom ek.

iven by Mr. Thomas maymusic itself s performed during there the music ot care who r string orchestra and flute.ven did not in A minor.

y, "But we h music by nt."

few in num- an excellent

ILIP HALE. horal. Finnie Fish Griffin. anchon H. Thompson. A. Knorr.

PAUR SATISFIES

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ATTENDANTS.

He Receives a Perfect Ovation at the Last of the Concerts—The Programme, However, is, as Usual, Poorly Arranged, which Makes the Salute all the More Significant.

When Mr. Paur stepped upon the platform Saturday evening he was welcomed in a most emphatic manner. It was evident that the large audience desired to put their verdict as to the conductor's ability on record; at the end of the concert the ovation was still more emphatic, and five times was the conductor obliged to come back to the platform to bow to the public enthusiasm. On no occasion, except at the farewell concert of Mr. Gericke, has a conductor of these concerts been given such a demonstration. One fact, therefore, may be taken as absolutely proven, Boston is satisfied with Mr. Paur, and is not casting any regretful glances towards the past.

As usual, however, the programme was an ill-assorted one; it began with pepper and ended with milk; after the most glowing instrumentation of the modern school it culminated with Beethoven in his weakest mood. It seemed as if the conductor purposely avoided a climax, and therefore the public demonstration was all the more significant. Wagner's "Huldigung's Marsch" was the first number of the concert. The marches of Wagner are by no means his most successful works; they are often blatant without being very coherent; their pomp goes to the verge of bombast; but this march of homage which the composer wrote for his royal friend, Louis II. of Bavaria, is certainly far above the peculiar triplet salad which he served to America in 1876, and far more definitely national music. The performance was a magnificent one, clear and brilliant, the climaxes well wrought up, and the shading of the sweeping crescendo effects almost marvellous. The technique of the orchestra was further shown in the Mephisto waltz of Liszt. It was injudicious to follow the extreme brilliancy of the march with the sensational waltz scene, for an anti-climax was bound to come after so much spice. Come it did with Schumann's charming "Genoveva" overture, which, although admirably played (and the horns deserve special mention) seldom has had less effect. Liszt's "Mephisto" scene is an uncomfortable neighbor for any reasonably melodic work, for its furious dissonances, its conflagration of passions, its phantasmagoria of tone-colors are too abnormal. Liszt has here set all the canons of art at defiance, he deliberately chooses the ugliest progressions, he revels in empty fifths, he delights in the weirdest instrumental touches.

"My brain's on fire, I am crazing. As I upon the girl am gazing" is the keynote of this none too refined tone-picture, and Satan's fiddle forms the background. Messrs. Schuecker and Sautet gave good account of the harp and oboe parts in this work.

To oppose Schumann's dainty picture of the downfall of vice and the triumph of innocence to this fiendish carnival was to give the victory to "the roses and raptures of Vice," for certainly the "lilies and languors of Virtue" seemed rather tame by the comparison. The diminished ninth chords of the beginning of the Schumann work seemed quite a conservative matter when placed in juxtaposition with the large and varied assortment of fifth progressions which Liszt had gathered together; and although the triumphant character of the finale made some amends, as a whole the overture was cast into shadow by the flames of its predecessor.

Then came Beethoven's sixth symphony to close the season. It almost seemed like self-abnegation on the part of Mr. Paur to choose this work as the finale of a very successful series of concerts; it was as if he scorned all fictitious aid and determined that there should be no climax to his efforts as a peg whereon to hang applause. Yet one plea might be put forth for the use of this symphony as keystone to the musical arch; it is programme music, and the non-musician clearly loves a story to be connected with his tones. If instrumental music is to be employed only for the purpose of telling a story, our art must at once be ranked far below poetry, painting, or sculpture. "Programme music" may be defined as instrumental music which either by a special title, or a printed plot, endeavors to convey definite ideas to the auditor. The vagueness of music is its strength. "Pure music" conveys emotional impressions, and becomes a stimulant to that which is poetical within the hearer, and in doing this performs a function which no other art can achieve as well. Yet the general public will forever crave a story in music. It seems to have been the same in ancient Greece, for Dorian, the Athenian wit, was once asked to listen to a representation of a storm at sea given upon the kithara, at the end of which he sensibly said: "I have heard a greater tempest in a pot of boiling water" (the origin of our "tempest in a teapot"), rebuking the absurd striving for definite effects in an art which should generally remain subjective.

Beethoven was the first to admit this style of work to the symphonic field and he produced thereby his weakest symphony. His apology at the beginning of the first movement (marked "more a picture of impressions than picture-painting") shows that he did not consider programme music the highest expression of art. Just this first movement is the best part of the symphony, since it is a well-developed sonata movement, and does not attempt to portray things with exactitude. This was played excellently and the effect of the retarding of the opening figure was a good one. The brusquerie of the closing theme and the heartiness of the coda founded chiefly upon this theme, were points of especial excellence. Beethoven seems to have left his good resolutions with the end of the first movement, and the symphony thereafter leaves the subjective for the objective school. The second movement is one of the nods of Homer. The

MUSIC

The Last Symphony of Season of '93-'94
Paur, Conductor.

The program of the 24th and the last of the season of '93-'94:
Huldigung's Marsch.....
Scene in the tavern—(Mephisto)
Lenau's "Faust".....
Overture—"Genoveva".....
Symphony No. 6.....

As Mr. Paur appeared on the hall last evening he was greeted with long-continued applause. The concert the great audience and again, seldom has a more been paid any conductor in the

This applause was undoubtedly a manifestation of the appreciation of the conductor is held in public recognition of the faith in him during the past season, an expression of specific delight in the concert itself.

In another column of this issue I have discussed the character of Mr. Paur, the conductor. His inability to arrange an effective and contrasted program. The peculiar to him; it was found in Mr. Nikisch. Making is concerned, no other symphony conductors has equal.

And yet the arrangement of the last evening shows in a curious sincerity and modesty of Mr. Paur, that the concert was the last. Now how many conductors would be choosing as the last number a symphony? How many would tent to dismiss the audience in a manner? Nine out of ten—Come now, we must make, would have selected carefully wall-shattering, sky-ascending in the aid of all the pulse known from the time of the A a people delighting in noise.

The numbers of this program and they call now for no other. The Pastoral Symphony is a vast pleasure to many, who mimicry of birds and the trill. But at the risk of being a phony, may I ask humbly if it is not so interminable the musical bore of huge dimensions, as a whole, even treated with real wheelbarrow ballet girls, as happened years ago, to be compared to any of the others of Beethoven the third?

Mr. Paur has earned honor. May he enjoy it as thoroughly as his musical duties.

The program book states that the concert of the 14th season will and that Mr. Emil Paur will

And what about the Symphony concerts?

I do not propose now that the season is over to discuss Mr. Paur, the conductor. When he first appeared I wrote my impressions in your columns, and those impressions are not materially changed.

But this may be said with justice: First—the Symphony concerts did not arouse popular excitement. Second—The programs were badly arranged and often dull.

Of course the popular taste in music and in performers is capricious. It always has been. A century ago Père Castel wrote that the pleasure derived from a popular concert is only real for a certain number of connoisseurs and zealous amateurs. "Many in the audience are bored, and they go, as to a theatre, from force of habit, because it is the fashion, or from a desire to be anywhere except at home."

Those concert-goers to whom the enjoyment of music is as dram drinking find little in Mr. Paur that excites them. To them he is a steady, painstaking, patient, intelligent man, who accomplishes his task with the fidelity of a trusted and venerable bookkeeper. They may respect his habits, but they wish that he were musically dissipated; they feel the absence of magnetism, or, if you please, that which is dramatic to the verge of the purely theatrical.

Others, on the contrary, regard Mr. Paur as an eminently safe man. The orchestra, like a maiden aunt, can be confided to his care without fear of resulting regret. As long as they have certain symphonies and overtures which they have known from their youth up they are content.

Others again are indifferent in the matter, and they are many. They go to the concerts as they go to church or to a reception, and as long as Mr. Paur does not commit any indiscretion on the stage they accept him, as they would if his name were Hauser or Blum. To such a novelty, particularly if it be of the ultra modern school, is an object of suspicion until its merits are acknowledged by people whom they are in the habit of meeting during the week.

Then there are others who care more for the music itself than for a conductor. As long as they recognize the music of Beethoven, Brahms or Wagner they do not care who holds the stick. If one says to them, "Beethoven did not mean that it should be thus read," they reply, "But we are satisfied—and after all you cannot spoil such music by any reading, provided that it be not extravagant."

There are others, and they are by no means few in number, who believe sincerely that Mr. Paur is an excellent conductor.

PHILIP HALE.

PAUR SATISFIES

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ATTENDANTS.

He Receives a Perfect Ovation at the Last of the Concerts—The Programme, However, is, as Usual, Poorly Arranged, which Makes the Salute all the More Significant.

When Mr. Paur stepped upon the platform Saturday evening he was welcomed in a most emphatic manner. It was evident that the large audience desired to put their verdict as to the conductor's ability on record; at the end of the concert the ovation was still more emphatic, and five times was the conductor obliged to come back to the platform to bow to the public enthusiasm. On no occasion, except at the farewell concert of Mr. Gericke, has a conductor of these concerts been given such a demonstration. One fact, therefore, may be taken as absolutely proven, Boston is satisfied with Mr. Paur, and is not casting any regretful glances towards the past.

As usual, however, the programme was an ill-assorted one; it began with pepper and ended with milk; after the most glowing instrumentation of the modern school it culminated with Beethoven in his weakest mood. It seemed as if the conductor purposely avoided a climax, and therefore the public demonstration was all the more significant. Wagner's "Huldigungs Marsch" was the first number of the concert. The marches of Wagner are by no means his most successful works; they are often blatant without being very coherent; their pomp goes to the verge of bombast; but this march of homage which the composer wrote for his royal friend, Louis II. of Bavaria, is certainly far above the peculiar triplet salad which he served to America in 1876, and far more definitely national music. The performance was a magnificent one, clear and brilliant, the climaxes well wrought up, and the shading of the sweeping crescendo effects almost marvellous. The technique of the orchestra was further shown in the Mephisto waltz of Liszt. It was injudicious to follow the extreme brilliancy of the march with the sensational waltz scene, for an anti-climax was bound to come after so much spice. Come it did with Schumann's charming "Genoveva" overture, which, although admirably played (and the horns deserve special mention) seldom has had less effect. Liszt's "Mephisto" scene is an uncomfortable neighbor for any reasonably melodic work, for its furious dissonances, its conflagration of passions, its phantasmagoria of tone-colors are too abnormal. Liszt has here set all the canons of art at defiance, he deliberately chooses the ugliest progressions, he revels in empty fifths, he delights in the weirdest instrumental touches.

"My brain's on fire, I am crazing.
As I upon the girl am gazing" is the keynote of this none too refined tone-picture, and Satan's fiddle forms the background. Messrs. Schuecker and Sautet gave good account of the harp and oboe parts in this work.

To oppose Schumann's dainty picture of the downfall of vice and the triumph of innocence to this fiendish carnival was to give the victory to "the roses and raptures of Vice," for certainly the "lilies and languors of Virtue" seemed rather tame by the comparison. The diminished ninth chords of the beginning of the Schumann work seemed quite a conservative matter when placed in juxtaposition with the large and varied assortment of fifth progressions which Liszt had gathered together; and although the triumphant character of the finale made some amends, as a whole the overture was cast into shadow by the flames of its predecessor.

Then came Beethoven's sixth symphony to close the season. It almost seemed like self-abnegation on the part of Mr. Paur to choose this work as the finale of a very successful series of concerts; it was as if he scorned all fictitious aid and determined that there should be no climax to his efforts as a peg whereon to hang applause. Yet one plea might be put forth for the use of this symphony as keystone to the musical arch; it is programme music, and the non-musician dearly loves a story to be connected with his tones. If instrumental music is to be employed only for the purpose of telling a story, our art must at once be ranked far below poetry, painting, or sculpture. "Programme music" may be defined as instrumental music which either by a special title, or a printed plot, endeavors to convey definite ideas to the auditor. The vagueness of music is its strength. "Pure music" conveys emotional impressions, and becomes a stimulant to that which is poetical within the hearer, and in doing this performs a function which no other art can achieve as well. Yet the general public will forever crave a story in music. It seems to have been the same in ancient Greece, for Dorian, the Athenian wit, was once asked to listen to a representation of a storm at sea given upon the kithara, at the end of which he sensibly said: "I have heard a greater tempest in a pot of boiling water" (the origin of our "tempest in a teapot"), rebuking the absurd striving for definite effects in an art which should generally remain subjective.

Beethoven was the first to admit this style of work to the symphonic field and he produced thereby his weakest symphony. His apology at the beginning of the first movement (marked "more a picture of impressions than picture-painting") shows that he did not consider programme music the highest expression of art. Just this first movement is the best part of the symphony, since it is a well-developed sonata movement, and does not attempt to portray things with exactitude. This was played excellently and the effect of the retarding of the opening figure was a good one. The brusquerie of the closing theme and the heartiness of the coda founded chiefly upon this theme, were points of especial excellence. Beethoven seems to have left his good resolutions with the end of the first movement, and the symphony thereafter leaves the subjective for the objective school. The second movement is one of the nods of Homer. The composer seems to have sat down by the brook and waited for the water to run by, determined to picture it to the very end. Yet this particular movement is one of the great delights of the laity; here is something tangible, and when they recognize that the clarinette is a cuckoo, the oboe a quail, and that there is other identifiable musical poultry in the work, they begin to imagine themselves musical analysts and feel a corresponding glow of satisfaction. The next movement is a better employment of the photographic process, for the playing of the village band, the entrance of the heavy-shod mountaineers, the three notes of the cracked bassoon constitute musical humor, and one must always be glad to see sunshine in the sensitive nature, to see Beethoven at play. The thunderstorm, too, may be ranked as one of the best pictures of its class; the anxious hush before the storm, the wonderful effect of piping wind upon the piccolo, and many other touches, show how keen an observer of nature Beethoven must have been.

The thunder-storm catalogue is rather a long one, Haydn in the "Seasons," Wagner in "Die Walküre," Bach in "Ye Lightnings," St. Saens in "The Deluge," Berlioz in the "Symphonie Fantastique," Rossini in the overture to "William Tell," have all produced spells of bad weather, but Beethoven's storm may still be awarded the palm in this field of musical meteorology. In the clearing up of the shower a peculiar point may be noted: the shepherd appears sounding his horn for his flocks. Now the English horn is the very instrument for this. Wagner in "Tannhauser" and Schumann in "Manfred" have employed it splendidly in this direction, and Rossini brought it in at a precisely similar episode to the Beethoven one (after a storm) in a masterly fashion: but Beethoven seems to have had no knowledge of the capacity of the instrument, and never uses it in his scores. Only in a scarcely known trio, op. 87, does he call for this noble instrument, and even here it is doubtful whether he had not one of the old-fashioned oboes in mind. In this symphonic finale he brings in clarinette and French horn for the shepherd calls. The clarinette deserves mention not only for its work here, but for its far more difficult passages in the second movement. The finale is dull music, it has no great climax, it is tiresome in repetition: it is the only weak finale that Beethoven ever made to a symphonic work. The applause that burst forth at the end was therefore not meant for this especial work, but became a public indorsement of Mr. Paur, a tangible statement that our music lovers do not sympathize with the attacks that have recently been made upon him. In such an indorsement the present writer most cordially joins. From the second month of the conductor's service here these columns have pointed out the gradual rehabilitation of our orchestra; the laxity which threatened the loss of that wonderful ensemble which Mr. Gericke has built up has disappeared, the orchestra is becoming what it was in its best days.

In the matter of modern progress too, Mr. Paur is showing himself a great acquisition, we are having the new works of the world on our programmes with commendable promptness. They are not always great works but we must needs hear them once for the sake of comparison. In this catholicity of taste the present conductor bids fair to be the foremost of all the symphonic leaders we have yet had here. Only one important blemish remains to chronicle; the programmes seem to be made up without any system, and sometimes even upon a bad system. The programme of this very concert may be taken as an instance; it came in like a lion and went out like a lamb; it led up to an anti-climax with conspicuous skill. But this is a fault that can be overcome; in the greater matters our conductor has been weighed and not found wanting. He is not a man who has reached the culmination of his powers, he is still growing and is likely to be even greater in a few years than he is today. He may yet attain the elasticity and caprice of his immediate predecessor, in addition to the virility, intelligence and musicianly conservatism which he already possesses.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

MUSIC. Sartre

And Still Recalcitrant!

The Musical Courier, in response to the comments we have made in this column, regarding its solemn decision that "Mr. Paur must go!" sets forth the following finely-pointed and keenly discriminating arguments. As will be seen, the reasoning is close, pertinent and convincing as to the impropriety of Mr. Paur remaining at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in face of the Courier's dignified and deeply conscientious opposition to him. It is true, that here and there, the Courier indulges in a little mirthfulness that is scarcely to the main point in question; but an exuberance of wit, especially when it is of the refined and brilliant order, felicitously exemplified by the Courier, carries its own excuse with it. Besides, something must be conceded to the exhilaration of spirits that must have attended the reading of our flattering remarks on the reputation for fairness, incorruptibility, honorable straightforwardness, and freedom from all suspicion of blackmailing that is enjoyed by the Courier, which, unfortunately, is quite unaccustomed to receive compliments of this nature, owing to the perverse hardheartedness of a censorious and misjudging world. We will, however, let the Courier speak for itself:

Benjamin, of the tribe of Woolf, has once more lashed himself into a fury because the Musical Courier suggested that Mr. Paur was making a mess of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and therefore must go. Ben gets these attacks periodically. He comes in with the hard times, and is a veritable Woolf at the door. When he barks and shows his teeth, then you know that either Wagner has disturbed his feeble musical digestion or else the Musical Courier has written something he did not like. It so happened several weeks ago that he heard the "Walküre" and also read (for the unfortunate man will persist in reading the Musical Courier, although he hates it) that Mr. Paur was not a great conductor. The "Walküre" soured him; the Musical Courier infuriated him, and after playing over some of his own piano sonatinas on a harpsichord, he sat him down and penned a foolish attack on Wagner and the Musical Courier. Oh, Benny, keep thy temper! Thy wits are not so nimble as of yore. You know in your inmost consciousness (not conscience, worthy cantor) that Paur is a most mediocre conductor, and if he remains another year with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it spells its artistic "ruin." Come, now, "Chatterer," acknowledge this, and give over your senseless attacks of rage because the press and public of New York will not submit to Mr. Paur being forced down their throats. We know you like Dussek better than you do Wagner, but you can't help it; it is your misfortune, not your fault. Because a pint measure wots not the capacity of a quart, it is to be pitied and not blamed. Your pint of brains are (sic) not strong enough to endure Wagner's mighty music, but pray do not interfere with our enjoyment. Take Paur. Keep Paur to yourself. Have a special hall built for him in Boston, or, better still, in the suburbs, and let him play to you until the scales fall from your eyes. You are afflicted with musical opthemia, and so that will not be an untoward thing. But do not let your Paur come to New York. We don't want him. He bores us, and so do you. Preach away to your little circle of readers that Wagner is a false god and the Musical Courier is a false prophet. Nobody believes you; you don't believe it yourself. Come now, do you? But you have one follower, for when you bark you wag your tail, and the wag is felt in the Boston Courier. The name of the wag is Howard Malcolm Ticknor, and a sad wag he is, to be sure.

After this exhaustive and conclusive setting forth of Mr. Paur's incompetency, it is not easy to see on what reasonable grounds any man can longer defend our Symphony Orchestra conductor from the attacks that have been made on him in New York. There is, in the same issue that contains this exemplary specimen of refined taste, polished rhetoric and masterly logic, a communication, signed R. G. Brown, and purporting to have been written in Boston, that is scarcely less eloquent in point of sentiment, and scarcely less brilliant in point of reasoning. We have a very strong suspicion that it was concocted in New York, and not one hundred miles from the office of the Courier. We have never heard of R. G. Brown, and have carefully searched the Boston Directory and the Blue Book for the name; but only find it twice;—once in connection with steam-heating apparatus, and once in connection with a restaurant. The Brown of the Courier might be either, for his pipes seem to be over-heated and his stomach to be dyspeptic. However, be this as it may, the music critic of the GAZETTE is likened by him to "the horse reporter,"—whatever that may mean; is called "the Boston man,"—which would scarcely have been written by a resident of this city writing from this city; is called "this fellow"; "a third-rate critic"; "the man"; "the apostle of mediocrity"; "the man from Boston,"—which also would scarcely have been written from Boston by a Bostonian of a Bostonian. Unfortunately, the Brown who has written to the Courier is somewhat muddled. Because one of the GAZETTE articles made passing reference to Mr. Nikisch's cuffs and Mr. Nikisch's boots in response to the Courier's reference to the fact that Mr. Paur did not fill Mr. Nikisch's boots, Brown says: "One would fancy that he had served his apprenticeship in a haberdasher's shop." It is not easy to see the connection between boots and haberdashery. Then, we are charged with saying that we do not "understand the difference between a 'first-rate' and a 'second-rate' conductor," which, as a matter of fact, we never did say, either in the form given or in any form that gave a colorable excuse for the misstatement. We are also accused of criticising the English of the Courier, which we never attempted to do. It is a thing, which in common with the English of Brown's letter, defies criticism. No; Brown wished to affirm that Mr. Nikisch is a first-rate conductor and that Mr. Paur is a second-rate conductor, and hence, such a trifle as truthfulness was not permitted to stand in his way. Brown, however, does not say why Mr. Nikisch is a good conductor or why Mr. Paur is a bad one. Does Brown know? Who is Brown, anyway? What does he mean when he says, "If this critic wishes to laud his protégé (protégé is good), and is able to find great merit, where other and more competent critics find none, there is, I suppose, nothing to discuss—save his taste." Can it be that Brown has not read what "more competent critics" have written in praise of Mr. Paur? Brown seems to have a sensitive sympathy with what he calls "ears polite." It would be well in him to look to his own ears, and to refrain from wagging them in public to an extent that attracts attention to their length.

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the last concert of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall, last night, was: "Huldigungs March," Wagner; "Mephisto Waltz," Liszt; Overture, "Genoveva," Schumann; Symphony No. 6, Beethoven. There was a very large attendance. Mr. Paur was given a reception that was marked by exceptional warmth and enthusiasm, the applause lasting for some moments, and with a fervor that testified fully and heartily to the high esteem in which the conductor is held by the public of the Symphony concerts. Here, as at the close of the concert it would seem as if the audience wished to give unmistakable evidence of the real state of its feelings toward Mr. Paur, and to set at rest for once and all, and in the most decided manner, all rumors that had been set afloat, in this city and elsewhere, regarding the consideration in which it holds him. At the close of concert he was recalled five times, amid the most stormy plaudits, and shouts of "bravo" and the waving of handkerchiefs. Rarely before, at these concerts have we witnessed such a demonstration of friendly feeling, and of sincere admiration for the conductor. The performances throughout were of the highest order, the "Mephisto" waltz receiving one of the most brilliant and most effective interpretations that we ever heard accorded the work. The Schumann overture was nobly read and played, the climax being worked up with splendid power. The Beethoven symphony, which, by the way, has become to us the least interesting of the master's great works, was given faultlessly. In fact, both conductor and orchestra were at their best.

288

The season, just ended, was the thirteenth in the existence of the orchestra. In summing it up, there is little to add to the comments we have made on the concert from week to week, in this column. Mr. Paur found the orchestra in a somewhat demoralized condition, owing to the lax discipline to which it had been subjected by his predecessor. Mr. Paur has restored it to all the efficiency it reached under Mr. Gericke, and imparted to it a more vigorous musical spirit than it had ever before manifested. It would seem, from reports, more or less in accordance with the exact facts, that have come to the general ear, that certain members of the orchestra did not take kindly to Mr. Paur, and displayed some resentment, that the favoritism which was shown them by Mr. Nikisch, was not continued by Mr. Paur, who, it appears, insisted on treating all the members of his orchestra in the same way, as it was perfectly just he should do. They were all equal in his eyes, and were all intended to strive for the same ends, and hence mere personal regard was sunk in a just consideration for the general results. It was complained by the malcontents that Mr. Paur did not rehearse his men with necessary diligence, which was somewhat amusing to all who know how restive and fretful musicians are under arduous rehearsals. However, whatever may be the truth or the falsehood of these stories anent lax rehearsing, the performances in public showed nothing of carelessness in preparation, and, after all, results, and not theories, are most to be looked to in such matters. Moreover, when it is remembered that the orchestra, or rather those of its members who seem, for some reason or other, to think themselves privileged to speak for it, found fault with Mr. Gericke and with Mr. Nikisch quite as freely as they have with Mr. Paur, it may be conceded that they are troubled with a chronic propensity to grumble at their superior officer. It does no special harm, particularly when the conductor has the will and the firmness to establish his authority, and to make it felt. This, Mr. Paur appears to have done. That he is an admirable musician, and a thoroughly able conductor, he has proved beyond all questioning. He has, however, shown no special skill in programme making, his programmes, as the rule, lacking in felicitous contrasts. Too often have we had a programme in which all the music has been similar in character, possibly with the intention of making them interesting from a historical point of view; but the want of variety in style and color has frequently made them dull, and, not seldom, tiresome. It is to be hoped that, next season, Mr. Paur may consider this subject, and bring a larger eclecticism and a more elastic judgment to bear on it. Of course, it is fully understood that German music must necessarily be the foundation of orchestral concerts, but it is not wholly unwise to pay some heed to the course of modern music in other nations, especially in full view of the important transition period at present prevailing in France and Italy. The first concert of the fourteenth season will be given October 13.

The first part of the last Symphony concert was pretty loud and lively. Wagner's "Huldigungs" march began it with large and stately strains. The great composer was never in better form and spirits than when he was writing for the brass choir; and although one finds in this score with its wide and various scheme of instrumentation the gentle and tasteful touch of Raff, who put the march into its present shape, one can still recognize the brass band feeling throughout the work, and wish that Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore might come back for a few days to give his version of it with all those wonderful and strange instruments of breath or blow which he had collected from various corners of the earth. The performance was a rousing one, and for once that kettledrummer had at times an accompaniment which almost covered him up.

Next was played the "Tavern" scene, with its Mephistophelian waltz, from Liszt's music to Lenau's "Faust." The scene is one of rough gaiety shot across with diabolical comment and malicious excitement of passion and desire. The reading was graphic in its outlines and dramatic in its color and motion. The many brief episodic bits for single instruments were capably put in, and the sudden harp-sweeps were especially telling.

A graver matter succeeded in Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, although it is only sombre and disquieted in its early phases, its later moods being earnest, energetic, buoyant and brilliant.

The concert ended with a faithful, sympathetic and delightful rendering of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which is so entirely in touch with the temper and the promises of spring. Mr. Paur had no need to exaggerate at any point in order to obtain his desired effects. His men have learned to understand and to obey, and while he has gained for himself their dutiful respect, he has regained for them that good opinion of the public which they had been losing during the past few seasons.

289
 At both the rehearsal and the concert Mr. Paur had a fine, warm reception and many full-hearted recalls.

And so ends the thirteenth season. It has been productive of much good, especially in restoring discipline and technique to the orchestra and confidence to the public. But the next season must do more. It must provide better programmes and recognize more fairly the musical talent of the world. Mr. Apthorp's careful digest of this season shows a total of ninety-six numbers of which ten had their first Boston hearings. Of that total, only eighteen, or less than one in five, were taken from other than German authors. Ten of these were French, Berlioz being drawn upon for four, Massenet and Saint-Saens for two each, and D'Albert and Molique being each named once. Russia, in the persons of Glinka and Tchaikowsky, supplied five pieces, and Boston men—Messrs. Palne, Loeffler and Johns, one each. That is not the right kind of showing and Mr. Paur must show more catholicity and wider love next winter. Some improvements are also needed in the personnel of the orchestra. The wood wind is not all equally good, and a man who will give tone instead of noise is necessary for the drums.

The fourteenth season is announced to begin on October 13, and it will probably sadden the heart (or the glizzard) of that unimportant New York weekly, which has so fretted and fumed over Symphony affairs, to find Mr. Paur's name still to the fore in spite of all its clamor. And, by the way, that same paper virtually acknowledges its defeat by ceasing to attack the Symphony cause and turning itself to the supporters of that cause. In a paragraph which is really nowhere nearly so ill-written as some of the music attributed to its editorial pens, it is pleased to characterize the COURIER as a bob to that kite to which it likens a neighbor of ours. This is probably meant to be uncomplimentary; but it is really more flattering to us than to our neighbor. For the best of kites will not fly well without a few bobs to balance and keep it straight, and the Gothamite kite would wobble a deal less if it could get itself a bob or two of better stuff than the one lightweight attachment which is all it has thus far hitched on. We have no objection to ascending heavenward with any lively and high-mounting kite, and we will do our best as an auxiliary in its flight. And our Gothamite contemporary may kindly remember that it was the bobs and strings of Franklin's kite which enabled him to catch the electric spirit, and that perhaps it may yet feel as if a little fresh lightning had been brought down for its own impalement if we should quote what a person very near its seat of authority said in Boston the other day about the necessity of abusing somebody or some interest here in order to attract a little attention to its own unnoticed self and so win the notoriety which it apparently prefers to respect.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

PROUD PAUR.

Symphony Season Closes
 Brilliantly.

Music Hall Filled With Fond
 Admirers.

Popular Leader Was Given
 Grand Ovation.

Conductor and Audience in Sympathy.

Beautiful Tone Pictures Given to Strings.

EMIL PAUR.

applause lasting for some moments, and with a fervor that testified fully and heartily to the high esteem in which the conductor is held by the public of the Symphony concerts. Here, as at the close of the concert it would seem as if the audience wished to give unmistakable evidence of the real state of its feelings toward Mr. Paur, and to set at rest for once and all, and in the most decided manner, all rumors that had been set afloat, in this city and elsewhere, regarding the consideration in which it holds him. At the close of concert he was recalled five times, amid the most stormy plaudits, and shouts of "bravo" and the waving of handkerchiefs. Rarely before, at these concerts have we witnessed such a demonstration of friendly feeling, and of sincere admiration for the conductor. The performances throughout were of the highest order, the "Mephisto" waltz receiving one of the most brilliant and most effective interpretations that we ever heard accorded the work. The Schumann overture was nobly read and played, the climax being worked up with splendid power. The Beethoven symphony, which, by the way, has become to us the least interesting of the master's great works, was given faultlessly. In fact, both conductor and orchestra were at their best.

The season, just ended, was the thirteenth in the existence of the orchestra. In summing it up, there is little to add to the comments we have made on the concert from week to week, in this column. Mr. Paur found the orchestra in a somewhat demoralized condition, owing to the lax discipline to which it had been subjected by his predecessor. Mr. Paur has restored it to all the efficiency it reached under Mr. Gericke, and imparted to it a more vigorous musical spirit than it had ever before manifested. It would seem, from reports, more or less in accordance with the exact facts, that have come to the general ear, that certain members of the orchestra did not take kindly to Mr. Paur, and displayed some resentment, that the favoritism which was shown them by Mr. Nikisch, was not continued by Mr. Paur, who, it appears, insisted on treating all the members of his orchestra in the same way, as it was perfectly just he should do. They were all equal in his eyes, and were all intended to strive for the same ends, and hence mere personal regard was sunk in a just consideration for the general results. It was complained by the malcontents that Mr. Paur did not rehearse his men with necessary diligence, which was somewhat amusing to all who know how restive and fretful musicians are under arduous rehearsals. However, whatever may be the truth or the falsehood of these stories anent lax rehearsing, the performances in public showed nothing of carelessness in preparation, and, after all, results, and not theories, are most to be looked to in such matters. Moreover, when it is remembered that the orchestra, or rather those of its members who seem, for some reason or other, to think themselves privileged to speak for it, found fault with Mr. Gericke and with Mr. Nikisch quite as freely as they have with Mr. Paur, it may be conceded that they are troubled with a chronic propensity to grumble at their superior officer. It does no special harm, particularly when the conductor has the will and the firmness to establish his authority, and to make it felt. This, Mr. Paur appears to have done. That he is an admirable musician, and a thoroughly able conductor, he has proved beyond all questioning. He has, however, shown no special skill in programme making, his programmes, as the rule, lacking in felicitous contrasts. Too often have we had a programme in which all the music has been similar in character, possibly with the intention of making them interesting from a historical point of view; but the want of variety in style and color has frequently made them dull, and, not seldom, tiresome. It is to be hoped that, next season, Mr. Paur may consider this subject, and bring a larger eclecticism and a more elastic judgment to bear on it. Of course, it is fully understood that German music must necessarily be the foundation of orchestral concerts, but it is not wholly unwise to pay some heed to the course of modern music in other nations, especially in full view of the important transition period at present prevailing in France and Italy. The first concert of the fourteenth season will be given October 13.

The first part of the last Symphony concert was pretty loud and lively. Wagner's "Huldigungs" march began it with large and stately strains. The great composer was never in better form and spirits than when he was writing for the brass choir; and although one finds in this score with its wide and various scheme of instrumentation the gentle and tasteful touch of Ruff, who put the march into its present shape, one can still recognize the brass band feeling throughout the work, and wish that Patrick Sarsfield Gilmore might come back for a few days to give his version of it with all those wonderful and strange instruments of breath or blow which he had collected from various corners of the earth. The performance was a rousing one, and for once that kettledrummer had at times an accompaniment which almost covered him up.

Next was played the "Tavern" scene, with its Mephistophelian waltz, from Liszt's music to Lenau's "Faust." The scene is one of rough gaiety shot across with diabolical comment and malicious excitement of passion and desire. The reading was graphic in its outlines and dramatic in its color and motion. The many brief episode bits for single instruments were capitally put in, and the sudden harp-sweeps were especially telling.

A graver matter succeeded in Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, although it is only sombre and disquieted in its early phases, its later moods being earnest, energetic, buoyant and brilliant.

The concert ended with a faithful, sympathetic and delightful rendering of Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, which is so entirely in touch with the temper and the promises of spring. Mr. Paur had no need to exaggerate at any point in order to obtain his desired effects. His men have learned to understand and to obey, and while he has gained for himself their dutiful respect, he has regained for them that good opinion of the public which they had been losing during the past few seasons.

At both the rehearsal and the concert Mr. Paur had a fine, warm reception and many full-hearted recalls.

And so ends the thirteenth season. It has been productive of much good, especially in restoring discipline and technique to the orchestra and confidence to the public. But the next season must do more. It must provide better programmes and recognize more fairly the musical talent of the world. Mr. Apthorp's careful digest of this season shows a total of ninety-six numbers of which ten had their first Boston hearings. Of that total, only eighteen, or less than one in five, were taken from other than German authors. Ten of these were French, Berlioz being drawn upon for four, Massenet and Saint-Saens for two each, and D'Albert and Mollque being each named once. Russia, in the persons of Glinka and Tchaikowsky, supplied five pieces, and Boston men—Messrs. Paine, Loeffler and Johns, one each. That is not the right kind of showing and Mr. Paur must show more catholicity and wider love next winter. Some improvements are also needed in the personnel of the orchestra. The wood wind is not all equally good, and a man who will give tone instead of noise is necessary for the drums.

The fourteenth season is announced to begin on October 13, and it will probably sadden the heart (or the glizzard) of that unimportant New York weekly, which has so fretted and fumed over Symphony affairs, to find Mr. Paur's name still to the fore in spite of all its clamor. And, by the way, that same paper virtually acknowledges its defeat by ceasing to attack the Symphony cause and turning itself to the supporters of that cause. In a paragraph which is really nowhere nearly so ill-written as some of the music attributed to its editorial pens, it is pleased to characterize the Courier as a bob to that kite to which it likens a neighbor of ours. This is probably meant to be uncomplimentary; but it is really more flattering to us than to our neighbor. For the best of kites will not fly well without a few bobs to balance and keep it straight, and the Gothamite kite would wobble a deal less if it could get itself a bob or two of better stuff than the one lightweight attachment which is all it has thus far hitched on. We have no objection to ascending heavenward with any lively and high-mounting kite, and we will do our best as an auxiliary in its flight. And our Gothamite contemporary may kindly remember that it was the bobs and strings of Franklin's kite which enabled him to catch the electric spirit, and that perhaps it may yet feel as if a little fresh lightning had been brought down for its own impalement if we should quote what a person very near its seat of authority said in Boston the other day about the necessity of abusing somebody or some interest here in order to attract a little attention to its own unnoticed self and so win the notoriety which it apparently prefers to respect.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

PROUD PAUR.

State

Symphony Season Closes
Brilliantly.

Music Hall Filled With Fond
Admirers.

Popular Leader Was Given
Grand Ovation.

Conductor and Audience in Sympathy.

Beautiful Tone Pictures Given to Strings.

EMIL PAUR.

Emil Paur had a magnificent reception last evening. He was heartily welcomed before the concert, and he was still more heartily cheered at the close.

His music stand was beautifully twined with green, and on the book rest were two bunches of flowers tied with white satin ribbon, one of superb roses and the other of delicate lilies of the valley.

"I suppose," said a Beacon st woman in the balcony to her companion, "we shall have a wild night; or do you think that the audience is not enthusiastic enough over Paur to go wild?"

No reply came to the query, for at that moment Mr Paur stepped upon the platform and no reply was needed.

The vast audience, filling every seat in Music hall, cheered as one man. Loud and enthusiastic clapping came from every part of the auditorium and the galleries, handkerchiefs waved and a murmur of applause ran through the audience.

Mr Paur bowed again and again. He essayed to sit down, but the audience rang out more applause, and he rose and repeated his bowing, smiling as he did so.

Conductor and audience were evidently in sympathy, and from the moment Mr Paur took up the baton to the moment he laid it down finally, conductor and audience were in close touch with each other.

Conductor Paur's program for the closing concert of the 13th symphony season was dignified and marked by nothing novel in the musical line. Wagner's Huldigung's march, Liszt's Mephisto waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony were the offerings.

The stately measures of the Wagner march, with its simple harmonies so grandly worked out in the orchestration were finely played, the brasses and wood-winds performing their work with a notable degree of sonorousness and harmony.

The lively, demoniacal, Mephisto waltz was given with the proper abandon and rollicking spirit, and Schumann's brilliant overture was effectively treated. The second theme, with the hunting call figures, was splendidly given, and the finale was also admirable in every way.

Beethoven's familiar "Pastoral," or sixth symphony, which closed the program, was, as a whole, the most delightful number. The peasants' dance and thunder storm call for special mention, the "effects" not being allowed to overshadow the beautiful tone pictures given to the strings. In the finale the "harmonic audacities" were delightfully presented, showing the almost perfect team work of Mr Paur's orchestra.

The Beethoven finale was the signal for a wild burst of applause, which was kept up for some time, Mr Paur bowing and smiling. Then he left the platform, but the applause broke forth again, and in answer to repeated cries of "Paur, Paur," the delighted conductor came on and gave a series of bows, placing his hand over his heart and smiling his thanks for the warm reception.

Mr Paur was recalled and cheered four times, and then he held an informal reception as enthusiastic admirers came up to shake hands with him.

Well-known musicians in the audience were the loudest in their applause, and from all sides was heard the warmest praise of Mr Paur.

It was an ovation the most distinguished conductor might be proud of, and Mr Paur seemed at times overcome with the scene.

The 14th season of symphony concerts will begin Saturday evening, Oct 13, with Emil Paur as conductor.

TEE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 13th season of the Symphony orchestra's concerts was ended with that given last evening under Mr. Emil Paur's direction, and the patrons rallied in full force to do honor to the occasion.

It is greatly to be regretted that Mr. Paur should have arranged his programme in such a way as to miss the desired effect which might easily have been attained by better care in this particular direction. The compositions chosen were excellent in every way, and if they had been turned top side down the season would have been ended in the most impressive fashion.

The arrangement of the programme was this: Wagner's "March of Homage," Liszt's "Mephisto" waltz, Schumann's "Genoveva" overture and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. It will be easily seen that the climax of this programme was in the beginning, and that what might have made an excellent opening made a very weak ending.

However, Mr. Paur and his programmes have been discussed sufficiently throughout this season, and it may be well to consider the character of the work done by the orchestra without further comment upon the selections and their arrangement.

The great march of Wagner was splendidly played throughout, the gradual working up of the theme which makes its principal feature being grandly done, and leaving a fine impression of the merits of this composition. The "Mephisto" waltz was brilliantly played, and the striking characteristics of the composition have seldom been brought out more distinctly or effectively. Schumann's lovely overture was played with excellent taste, and the reading of the Beethoven symphony commanded unqualified approval.

Mr. Paur had a grand ovation as he entered to take his stand at the gaily bedecked desk, and he had to repeat his acknowledgments of the applause a half dozen times before he could rap the orchestra to order. A similar scene followed the conclusion of the programme, the audience standing and applauding until he had repeatedly returned to bow his thanks for the favor shown him. He has good cause to be satisfied with the recognition of his season's labors by the patrons of the concerts and the official announcement of his continuance as conductor for next season was generally commended.

The season thus ended has been in some ways an uneventful one. There has been little that was sensational, but much that was satisfactory. Mr. Paur has shown himself to be a thoroughly conservative, careful and competent director. He has labored faithfully to make the concerts of the year command the respect of the best lovers of classical music, and in the works that he has placed upon his programme he has afforded a hearing of more standard compositions than novelties.

A summary of the programmes shows that 96 different compositions have been performed in the 24 concerts. Beethoven takes precedence in the list with 14 works. Wagner and Mozart follow with eight each, Brahms seven, Schumann five, Berlioz Liszt, Mendelssohn four each, Rubenstein, Schubert, Weber and Tchaikowsky three each, Bruch, Dvorak, Glinka, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Massenet, Saint Saens and Volkmann two each, and D'Albert, Bach, Von Bulow, Goetz, Emil Hartman, Johns, Loeffler, Molique, Paine, Smetana, Richard Strauss one each.

Coming to Boston on so short a notice and with so limited a knowledge of American musicians, it is easy to pardon Mr. Paur for his limited recognition of the native born composer in his first season. He has, however, shown such a respect for the ability of those with whom he has been associated that it is natural to expect a more general hearing of the works of American composers in his concerts during the coming seasons.

All in all Mr. Paur's record during his first season is one to be heartily commended, and his retention for the entire term of his contract will certainly maintain the standing of Boston's orchestra in the front rank of the world's organization of this class.

The 14th season will begin on Saturday evening, Oct. 13.

THE LAST SYMPHONY

Conductor Paur Given an Appreciative Au Revoir.

EFFECTIVE PROGRAMME.

Colonel Higginson Shares the Applause.

All Paur Rumors Officially Laid to Rest by the Programmes.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the 24th and last concert of this season's series at Music Hall Saturday evening. The following programme was performed:

Huldigungs March..... Wagner
Mephisto Waltz..... Liszt
"Genoveva" Overture..... Schumann
Symphony No. 6..... Beethoven

Mr. Paur has proved in the half dozen or so selections that he has given from Wagner's works to be an admirable exponent of that great modern genius. And so on this occasion he made much of the noisy, blatant and simple, if not commonplace "March of Homage" of the mighty Richard.

The performance of the "Mephisto Waltz" was one of rare brilliancy, and reflected credit upon the wonderful skill of the orchestra and the admirable conducting of Mr. Paur alike.

Both the overture to "Genoveva" of Schumann and the Beethoven's sixth symphony were given in a manner that displayed the just estimate that Conductor Paur possesses of the value of the classics, and showed also his integrity in dealing with the works of the older masters. The playing of the orchestra in these two numbers was simply perfect, as it was also in the two previous and more modern compositions. One has only to grumble at the wearisome length of the slow movement of the symphony.

It is gratifying to observe the complete rehabilitation of the orchestra under the rigid discipline of Mr. Paur, after its depreciation under the influence of Mr. Nikisch's connection with it during the previous four seasons. The judicious have to rejoice that the theatric vulgarity that offended during Nikisch's incumbency has been entirely displaced since Mr. Paur's advent, and a high and noble form of interpretation been instituted in its place. Mr. Paur has made an eminent success as a conductor, and every unprejudiced listener must acknowledge his superiority in this respect.

Mr. Paur has, however, one short-coming, and that is the inability to arrange an interesting and well-contrasted programme. Neither has he shown a sufficiently catholic taste in the selection of authors to be represented in his programmes. It might be a profitable effort upon his part to study the make-up of the programmes presented by Theodore Thomas at his Symphony Concerts and imitate the latter conductor in his liberal manner of drawing from the works of composers of all nationalities, and in his happy contrasting of works, old and new, grave and gay, German and French, Russian and American, etc.

Mr. Paur must remember that conservative and partisan Leipzig is one place and cosmopolitan America quite another, and that as the former is quite content within its narrow boundaries, here in America exists an ever restless spirit of constant expansion in matters of music as well as in the ordinary affairs of mechanics and business generally.

We look out upon the whole world, while the vision of the denizen of Leipzig seldom reaches beyond the borders of its own township.

Mr. Paur is not alone in this matter of ill-contrasted and ill-liberally framed programmes, for both Gerlicke and Nikisch were similarly afflicted. To be sure, Gerlicke improved considerably as he recognized the necessity of his becoming more catholic in his tastes, but he did not advance much beyond the Viennese formula in his selections for performance.

It is to be hoped that Mr. Paur will recognize the necessity as well, but will correspondingly advance in his taste, and next season give his listeners much more varied and discriminatingly arranged programmes.

A most significant feature of the concert on Saturday evening was the warm and hearty welcome extended Mr. Paur when he appeared to begin the performance. The audience in the most spontaneous manner applauded Mr. Paur, the demonstration being of extraordinary duration in its enthusiasm. At the end of the performance Mr. Paur was recalled several times, the tumultuous and constant applause, with shouts of "Bravo!" obliging him to come forth again and again to bow to the immense audience of admirers, whose confidence and admiration he had gained through the earnest, modest, conscientious, musician-like and skilful manner in which he has fulfilled the duties of his onerous position. I doubt if there has ever been so spontaneous, so enthusiastic, and so heartfelt an offering extended anyone in the musical profession since Music Hall has existed as was the expression of the audience on Saturday evening in Mr. Paur's behalf.

If there were any grumbling, sore-headed or self-sufficient and mistaken players among the orchestra, they had a fine opportunity to discover in whom the public put its trust, as the master of the situation.

It is only to be regretted that Mr. Higginson could not have been brought out of his retirement as one of this great audience, to have been the recipient also of a demonstration that would have shaken the walls of the Music Hall. In his extraordinary modesty, this great benefactor to the cause of music in Boston should be assured that the munificence of his effort in behalf of the interests of his music-loving townsmen is duly appreciated, and that he has made for himself a niche in the cause of art that must ever redound to his memory and as permanently call forth the gratitude of all those who have reaped the blessings that arise from the beneficence of his generous act.

The opening concert of the 14th season will take place Saturday evening, Oct. 13, 1894. It is unnecessary to state that Mr. Emil Paur will be the conductor, regardless of the effort of the affected critics of the New York press to disparage his continuance.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Trans:

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-fourth symphony concert, the closing one of the season, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Wagner: Huldigungs-Marsch.
Liszt: Scene in the Village Tavern (Mephisto-Waltz).
from Lenau's "Faust."
Schumann: Overture to "Genoveva," Opus 81.
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F major ("Pastoral") Opus 68.

How well worth while it is to begin, or close, a symphony season with a "significant" composition is a matter of taste. Time was in Boston when the winter's orchestral music was usually ushered in by the "Weihe des Hauses" overture (the term "Weihe," "consecration," being generally accepted as giving this work a certain fitness as a sort of musical "race before meat"), and the last concert ended in a blaze of glory with the third "Leonore," or some other composition with a stirring coda to it. The custom may have had its good and quasi-poetic side, but has been not a little laughed at in some quarters.

Surely Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony, as a snapper to a long orchestral whip, is not open to the objection of would-be-significant splurging; it is quiet enough in all conscience, and might be taken to signify (if, indeed, it signify anything beyond its own musical self) a desire to substitute the Catholic "Dona nobis pacem" for the more classic "Vos valet et plaudite." And yet the audience seemed, to a man, to take it in the latter sense,—or, perhaps, they needed no implied invitation to crown the season with an outburst of enthusiasm—for, when the last measure of the symphony had died away, they gave Mr. Paur such an ovation, bravo-shouting and hand-clapping as our old Music Hall has not often witnessed within its walls. Four times he was called out, responding, not with prima-donna alacrity, as if to catch the bubble reputation before it burst, but with dignified modesty, as of a man who was conscious of having done what he was engaged to do, and did not think honestly rendered services a matter for unusual demonstrations of praise.

The performance of the whole programme was extremely fine. The Huldigungs-Marsch was played with grand power and with a dignity of style that showed the work in its true light. Schumann's "Genoveva" overture, too, went splendidly, and its whirling coda was given with immense effect. Liszt's "Mephisto-Waltz," which we are hearing, perhaps, a thought too often of late years, was played with a vim and finesse that left nothing to be desired. The ever-beautiful "Pastoral" was played well-nigh to perfection. One could only take exception to the rapid tempo of the Peasants' Dance, which sounded rather out of date in this year of grace 1894, and reminded one of the old-time conductor—"vom alten Schrot"—who, as a rule, was somewhat over-fond of very brisk Allegros. But, with this exception, the symphony was most sympathetically conducted and admirably played.

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS DURING THE SEASON 1893-94.

	PAGE
D'ALBERT. Overture to GRILLPARZER'S "Esther," op. 8 *	494
BACH. Orchestral Suite No. 2, in B minor	405
BEETHOVEN. Symphony No. 5, in C minor, op. 67	13
Recitative, " Abscheulicher! " and Aria, " Komm Hoffnung, " from "Fidelio"	53
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, op. 72	95
Symphony No. 1, in C major, op. 21	293
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, op. 58	310
Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61	333
Overture to "Coriolan," op. 62	407
Symphony No. 8, in F major, op. 93	473
Overture to "Egmont," op. 84	566
Symphony No. 4, in B flat major, op. 60	620
Two movements from Symphony No. 9, in D minor, op. 125	668
Symphony No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), op. 55	728
Overture to KOTZEBUE'S "King Stephen," op. 117	817
Symphony No. 6, in F major ("Pastoral"), op. 68	842
BERLIOZ. Three movements from Symphony No. 4, "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17	189
Overture to "King Lear," op. 4	422
Rákóczy March from "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24	460
Fantastic Symphony, No. 1, in C major, op. 14A	581
BRAHMS. Academic Festival Overture, op. 80	153
Concerto for violin and violoncello, in A minor, op. 102	162
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68	219
Variations on a Theme by JOSEF HAYDN, op. 56A	261
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 73	509
Tragic Overture, op. 81	746
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, op. 98	801
BRUCH. Romanza for violin, in A minor, op. 42	515
"Kol Nidrei," for violoncello, orchestra, and harp, op. 47	709
VON BÜLOW. Funerale, op. 23, No. 4 *	727
DVOŘÁK. Slavonic Rhapsody No. 2, in G minor, op. 45 *	46
Symphony No. 8, in E minor ("From the New World"), op. 95 *	329
GLINKA. Komarinskaja	602
Overture to "Ruslan and Ludmilla" *	603
GLUCK. Aria, " Ah! si la liberté, " from "Armide"	130
Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"	169
GOETZ. Symphony in F major, op. 9	79
HANDEL. Concerto grosso No. 10, in D minor	549
Air, "Honour and arms," from "Samson"	550
HARTMANN, EMIL. Overture to a Tragedy, "A Northern Campaign" *	530
HAYDN. Symphony in D major (No. 2, Breitkopf & Härtel Ed.)	556
Air, "With verdure clad," from "The Creation."
JOHNS, CLAYTON. Berceuse and Scherzo for strings	694

LISZT. Spanish Rhapsody, rearranged as a Concert-Piece for piano-forte and orchestra by FERRUCCIO BUSONI *	458
Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus"	593
A Faust Symphony	689
Mephisto Waltz, from "Scenes from Lenau's Faust"	837
LOEFFLER, C. M. Fantastic Concerto for violoncello (MS.) *	482
MASSNET. Recitative, " Celui dont la parole ," and Air, " Il est doux, il est bon ," from "Hérodiade"	44
Recitative, " De cet affreux combat ," and Air, " Pleurez! pleurez, mes yeux! " from "Le Cid"	117
MENDELSSOHN. Symphony No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch"), op. 56	418
Overture to "Fingal's Cave," op. 26	635
Overture to "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," op. 27	711
Music to SHAKSPEARE'S "Midsummer-Night's Dream." (GEORGE RIDDLE, reader)	761
MOLIQUE. Two movements from Concerto for violin, No. 5, in A minor, op. 21	745
MOZART. Symphony in C major ("Jupiter")	153
Overture to "The Magic Flute"	229
Serenade No. 7, in D major ("Haffner")	298
Aria, " Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen ," from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail"	565
Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro"	617
Symphony in G minor	653
Aria, " Voi che sapete ," from "Le nozze di Figaro"
Recitative, " Crudele? " and Aria, " Non mi dir ," from "Don Giovanni"	799
PAINE. Prelude to the "Ædipus Tyrannus" of SOPHOCLES, op. 35	797
RUBINSTEIN. Dramatic Symphony, No. 4, in D minor, op. 95	279
Two movements from the Ballet-Music in "Feramors"	491
"Don Quixote," Musical Character-Piece (Humoresque), op. 87	532
SAINT-SAËNS. Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning-wheel," op. 31	129
Concert-Piece for violin with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62	517
SCHUBERT. Symphony No. 9, in C major	59
"Wanderer"-Fantasia, op. 15, rearranged for pianoforte and orchestra by FRANZ LISZT	196
Overture to "Rosamunde," op. 26	316
SCHUMANN. Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38	205
Overture to "Manfred," op. 115	257
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120	445
Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52	638
Overture to "Genoveva," op. 81	838
SMETANA. Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau" *	243
STRAUSS, RICHARD. Symphony in F minor, op. 12 *	113
TSCHAIKOWSKY. Serenade for strings, in C major, op. 48	23
Two movements from Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, op. 35	238
Overture, "1812," op. 49 *	351
VOLKMANN. Overture to SHAKSPEARE'S "Richard III.," op. 68	43
Serenade for strings, No. 3, in D minor, op. 69	94

WAGNER. Overture to "Tannhäuser"	25
Prelude to "The Master-Singers of Nuremberg"	365
Prelude and "Love-Death" from "Tristan and Isolde"	367
Siegfried Idyl	371
A Faust Overture	374
Siegfried's Funeral March, from "Götterdämmerung"	376
Brünnhilde's dying speech over Siegfried's body, from "Götterdämmerung"	378
March of Homage	833
WEBER. Overture to "Euryanthe"	437
Concert-Piece for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, op. 79	441
Overture to "Oberon"	673

SUMMARY.

D'ALBERT,	1	LOEFFLER,	1
BACH,	1	MASSNET,	2
BEETHOVEN,	14	MENDELSSOHN,	4
BERLIOZ,	4	MOLIQUE,	1
BRAHMS,	7	MOZART,	8
BRUCH,	2	PAINE,	1
VON BÜLOW,	1	RUBINSTEIN,	3
DVOŘÁK,	2	SAINT-SAËNS,	2
GLINKA,	2	SCHUBERT,	3
GLUCK,	2	SCHUMANN,	5
GOETZ,	1	SMETANA,	1
HANDEL,	2	STRAUSS, RICHARD,	1
HARTMANN, EMIL,	1	TSCHAIKOWSKY,	3
HAYDN,	2	VOLKMANN,	2
JOHNS,	1	WAGNER,	8
LISZT,	4	WEBER,	3

* First time in Boston.

SUMMARY BY WORKS.

I. SYMPHONIES.

BEETHOVEN. No. 5, in C minor, op. 67.
No. 1, in C major, op. 21.
No. 8, in F major, op. 93.
No. 4, in B-flat major, op. 60.
No. 3, in E-flat major ("Eroica"), op. 55.
No. 9, in D minor, op. 125 (Adagio and Scherzo).
No. 6, in F major ("Pastoral"), op. 68	7
BERLIOZ. No. 4, "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17 (three movements).
No. 1, in C major ("Fantastic"), op. 14A	2
BRAHMS. No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.
No. 2, in D major, op. 73.
No. 4, in E minor, op. 98	3

DVOŘÁK. No. 8, in E minor ("From the New World"), op. 95 . . .	I
GOETZ. In F major, op. 9	I
HAYDN. No. 2 (Breitkopf & Härtel Ed.), in D major	I
LISZT. A Faust Symphony	I
MENDELSSOHN. No. 3, in A minor ("Scotch"), op. 56	I
MOZART. In C major ("Jupiter"). In G minor	2
RUBINSTEIN. No. 4, in D minor ("Dramatic"), op. 95	I
SCHUBERT. No. 9, in C major	I
SCHUMANN. No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38. No. 4, in D minor, op. 120	2
STRAUSS, RICHARD. In F minor, op. 12	I

II. SUITES AND SERENADES.

BACH. Orchestral Suite No. 2, in B minor	I
HANDEL. Concerto grosso No. 10, in D minor	I
MOZART. Serenade No. 7, in D major ("Haffner")	I
SCHUMANN. Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52	I
TSCHAIKOWSKY. Serenade for Strings, in C major, op. 48	I
VOLKMANN. Serenade for Strings, No. 3, in D minor, op. 69	I
	6

III. OVERTURES AND PRELUDES.

D'ALBERT. To Grillparzer's "Esther," op. 8	I
BEETHOVEN. To "Leonore" No. 3, op. 72. To "Coriolan," op. 62. To "Egmont," op. 84. To "King Stephen," op. 117	4
BERLIOZ. To "King Lear," op. 4	I
BRAHMS. Academic Festival Overture, op. 80. Tragic Overture, op. 81	2
GLINKA. To "Ruslan and Ludmilla"	I
GLUCK. To "Iphigenia in Aulis"	I
HARTMANN, EMIL. Overture to a Tragedy, "A Northern Campaign"	I
MENDELSSOHN. To "Fingal's Cave," op. 26. "Sea-calm and Prosperous Voyage," op. 27. To "Midsummer-Night's Dream," op. 21	3
MOZART. To "The Magic Flute." To "The Marriage of Figaro"	2
PAINE. To "Œdipus Tyrannus," op. 35	I
SCHUBERT. To "Rosamunde," op. 26	I
SCHUMANN. To "Manfred," op. 115. To "Genoveva," op. 81	2
TSCHAIKOWSKY. "1812," op. 49	I
VOLKMANN. To "Richard III.," op. 68	I

WAGNER. To "Tannhäuser." To "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." To "Tristan and Isolde." A Faust Overture	4
WEBER. To "Euryanthe." To "Oberon"	2
	28

CONCERTOS AND INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS.

BEETHOVEN. Concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in G major, op. 58 (CARL BAERMANN). Concerto for violin, in D major, op. 61 (FRANZ KNEISEL)	2
BRAHMS. Concerto for violin and violoncello, in A minor, op. 102 (FRANZ KNEISEL and ALWIN SCHROEDER)	I
BRUCH. Romanza for violin, in A minor, op. 42 (C. M. LOEFFLER). "Kol Nidrei," for 'cello, orchestra, and harp, op. 47 (LEO SCHULZ)	2
LISZT. Spanish Rhapsody, rearranged as a Concert-Piece for piano- forte and orchestra by FERRUCCIO BUSONI (F. BUSONI)	I
LOEFFLER. Fantastic Concerto for violoncello (ALWIN SCHROEDER)	I
MOLIQUE. Two movements from Concerto for violin, No. 5, in A minor, op. 21 (OTTO ROTH)	I
SAINT-SAËNS. Concert-Piece for violin with orchestra, in E minor, op. 62 (C. M. LOEFFLER)	I
SCHUBERT. "Wanderer"-Fantasia, op. 15, rearranged by FRANZ LISZT (Mrs. PAUR)	I
TSCHAIKOWSKY. Two movements from Concerto for violin, No. 2, in D major, op. 35 (TIMOTHÉE ADAMOWSKI)	I
WEBER. Concert-Piece for pianoforte and orchestra, in F minor, op. 79 (F. BUSONI)	I 12

SCENAS, ARIAS, ETC.

BEETHOVEN. "Abscheulicher!" etc., from "Fidelio" (LILLIAN NORDICA)	I
GLUCK. "Ah! si la liberté," from "Armide" (EMMA EAMES)	I
HANDEL. "Honour and arms," from "Samson" (MAX HEINRICH)	I
HAYDN. "With verdure clad," from "The Creation" (LILLIAN BLAUVELT)	I
MASSENET. "Il est doux, il est bon," from "Hérodiade" (LILLIAN NORDICA. ANTOINETTE TREBELLI).*
"Pleurez! pleurez, mes yeux," from "Le Cid" (EMMA EAMES)	2
MOZART. "Solche hergelauf'ne Laffen," from "Die Entführung" (MAX HEINRICH). "Voi che sapete," from "Le nozze di Figaro" (LILLIAN BLAU- VELT). "Non mi dir, bell' idol mio," from "Don Giovanni" (ANTOINETTE TREBELLI)	3

WAGNER. "Isolde's Love-Death," from "Tristan and Isolde" (AMALIA MATERNA).
Last scene from "Götterdämmerung" (AMALIA MATERNA)	2
	II

MISCELLANEOUS.

BERLIOZ. Rákóczy March from "The Damnation of Faust," op. 24	I
BRAHMS. Variations on a Theme by JOSEF HAYDN, op. 56A	I
VON BÜLOW. Funerale, op. 23, No. 4	I
DVOŘÁK. Slavonic Rhapsody No. 2, in G minor, op. 45	I
GLINKA. Komarinskaja	I
JOHNS, CLAYTON. Berceuse and Scherzo for strings	I
LISZT. Symphonic Poem No. 4, "Orpheus."
Mephisto Waltz from "Scenes from Lenau's Faust"	2
RUBINSTEIN. Two movements from the Ballet-music in "Feramors."
"Don Quixote," Musical Character-Piece (Humoresque), op. 87	2
SAINT-SAËNS. Symphonic Poem No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning-wheel," op. 31	I
SMETANA. Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau"	I
WAGNER. Siegfried Idyl.
Siegfried's Funeral March from "Götterdämmerung."
March of Homage	3
	15

Total number of compositions given 96

* Given twice.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, APRIL 28, 1894.

PAGES 9 TO 16.

PLANS FOR THE "POPS."

They Will Begin Earlier Than Usual, With Adamowski as Leader.

Now that the warm weather of the last few days has reminded people of the still warmer days that are to come, it will be welcome news to the amusement-loving people of Boston to know that the "Pop" concerts this year are to begin almost three weeks earlier than usual. It is announced today that the season will open on the 12th of May, and although no definite time has been set for the ending of the season, it will probably continue well into July. As for the past few years, Timothée Adamowski will conduct the concerts and will have an orchestra of fifty musicians selected from the Symphony Orchestra. Adamowski's popularity as the conductor of these very popular concerts has now become so widespread that it would be a disappointment indeed were it not given out with the announcement of the opening of the concerts that he was to conduct them. The concerts will be carried on in the same popular way as in years before, and as Mr. Ellis was today granted a license by the Police Commissioners, the café arrangements will be the same as before. Last year's season was such a popular one among society people of the city, and it was considered so much "the thing" to get up parties to go to the "Pops" that the announcement that the season this year is to begin before the exodus to summer resorts will be a pleasing one.

MUSIC AND MENUS.

Ninth Season of the Summer Promenade Concerts.

Large and Fashionable Audience Enjoys Melodies and Viands.

Conductor Adamowski Presents an Admirable Program.

When Mr Timothee Adamowski came threading his way among the violins and violas on the platform of Music hall last evening and stood bowing and smiling and smiling and bowing to every quarter of the hall, he faced one of the biggest audiences that ever attended a promenade concert in this city.

It was the opening of the ninth summer series, and a more propitious and auspicious opening was never seen by manager C. A. Ellis and his very efficient assistant, Mr Fred R. Comee, both of whom justly anticipate a prosperous season.

Considerable effort had been expended to put the hall in gala attire in honor of the opening night. In the rear of the platform was a perfect forest of evergreens, which completely hid Beethoven's legs from sight. Palms and two enormous tubs of roses adorned the front of the platform, and the railings of both galleries were festooned with smilax and evergreen. Even the Apollo Belvidere in the rear of the hall wore a couple festoons of evergreen in addition to his customary fig leaf.

The festive appearance of the hall was quite in keeping with the character of the immense audience, which long before 8 o'clock began to appear. Every chair at every table on the floor was soon occupied, and it was not long before every available seat in the first and second balconies was taken. Those who came later wandered, like the spirit in the parable, through dry places seeking rest and finding none.

They thronged the corridors and passageways, peering in at the doors, sitting on the platform steps, getting in the way of the waiters, and being generally as uncomfortable as one can be in a jam. One hour was enough for many of them, but their places were taken by the late comers, of whom there were many.

There was a big delegation present from Harvard, but probably on account of the depressing news from New Haven they were very subdued, much to the relief of those who wanted to hear the music.

Many of the younger women were out in the fearful and wonderful new summer styles of 1894—wide skirts and big yokes on the shoulders, like the contrivances for carrying pails of milk or water. Here and there was a young man with a straw hat, which looked like forcing the season if the season needed any forcing.

There was an unusual number of swains with their girls, all of them looking very happy, and in the second balcony were a great many aged people.

Mr Adamowski received a very cordial greeting upon his entrance, but the noise and confusion, incident to the large crowd, were so great that it was only at the conclusion of the third number, a waltz, that any enthusiastic applause was evoked. Then the encore was given with a hearty good will.

In the audience of 2700—the biggest that ever was present at an opening night of the promenade concert—were many leaders in social, business and professional life, making the affair remarkable for its brilliance. Among those who occupied seats at the reserved tables were:

Mr and Mrs H. L. Higginson and party, Mrs S. P. Blake Jr, Mrs John L. Gardner and party, Mr Charles Head and party, Mrs Auchincloss, Mr and Mrs Fennolosa, Mr and Mrs Franz Zerrahn and party, Mr and Mrs Eben Jordan Jr, Mrs Winsor and party, Dr Whitredge, Mr Quincy A. Shaw Jr, Mrs and Miss Houston, the Misses Shattuck, Mr W. P. Blake, Mr Matthew Luce, Dr Davenport, Mrs Frank Watson, Dr Hamilton Osgood, Mr Arthur Foote, Mr Charles E. Lauriat and party, Mr and Mrs R. C. Dixey, Mr G. R. Clarke, Mr and Mrs B. E. Woolf, Mr and Mrs W. F. Apthorp, Mr Adelbert H. Alden and party, Mr E. Rollins Morse and party, Mr Warren A. Locke, Mr W. P. Blake and party, Mr C. M. Loeffler, Mr Temple R. Fay, Mr R. H. Stephenson, Mr Daniel Frank and party, Mr Charles E. Sampson and party, Mr W. F. Sears and Mr Seth Sprague.

The table service was excellent, when the size of the crowd is taken into consideration, and the waiters managed to attend to the patrons promptly.

The musical program was excellent, combining the classical with the popular style of compositions. Mr Adamowski, who assumes the baton for the third time at these concerts, is not only an able director, but his long association in the symphony concerts with the half hundred musicians which comprise the present orchestra insures good "team" work without any special drilling by his forces.

The program was as follows:

Grand polonaise (first time) Palfy
Overture, Count Robert of Paris, (MS) (first time) H W Parker
Kaiser waltz Joh Strauss
Selection, Carmen Bizet
Scenes Pittoresques Massenet
Largo, solo violin, Mr I Schnitzler Handel
Overture, Tannhauser Wagner
Suite, Casse-Noisette (first time) Tschalkowsky
Intermezzo, Il Pagliaccio Leoncavallo
Selection, Robin Hood De Koven
Czardas, from Coppella Delibes
Tabasco march Chadwick

The bustle and confusion during the first two numbers prevented enthusiasm, and the merits of the selections were lost to many of the auditors. The polonaise was given with good results, the string contingent playing very smoothly, and the overture by Mr H. W. Parker was also well played, although the delicacy and shading in the piano passages lost their effect by reason of the turmoil in the auditorium.

With the Strauss waltz applause began and several encores were demanded in the course of the evening. The gem of the program was the Handel largo, with Mr Schnitzler as solo violinist, which was charmingly interpreted.

A new composition by Tschalkowsky was a characteristic work, brilliantly performed, and the Tannhauser overture was admirably given, though lacking the necessary number of brasses for grand sonorous effects.

The lighter selections were interpreted with the proper dash and rhythmic swing and were specially appreciated, probably by reason of contrast with the more stately numbers.

The audience was well pleased with the program, for but few of the immense throng left the hall before the last selection was played.

Tomorrow evening the program for the second concert will be:

March, Queen of Sheba.....	Gold
Overture, The Bronze Horse.....	And
Waltz, Harlequin en Voyage.....	Zach
Selection, Aida.....	Vardi
Ballet music, Ueber Allen.....	Lassen
Polonaise.....	Liszt
Prelude, The Deluge, solo violin.....	Saint-Saens
Mr I Schnitzler.....
Overture, Rienzi.....	Wagner
Selection, Princess Trebizonde.....	Offenbach
Waltz, Magnolia Blossoms (first time).....	De Koven
Mazourka, Unparteiliche Kritik.....	Joh Strauss
Rakoczy march.....	Berlioz

AN IMPRESSION OF THE POPS.

The following, written with lead pencil, in a neat feminine hand, evidently an impromptu, was recently picked up under one of the tables frequented by the most fashionable visitors to the popular concerts at Music Hall:

ADAM-HOUSE-KEY.

His name suggests his genius bright
"The first to open doors of light."
He stands, behind a row of palms,
With baton raised and outstretched arms.

All praise too faint for the patron saint
Of beer and music, smoke and babble,
Wit profound and senseless gabble.

The Summer girls with frou-frou laces
The Harvard men, with studious faces,
The debutante who's all the rage,
With chaperone of middle age,
The business man from care released,
The doctor, lawyer, author, priest,
The matron staid, the giddy maid—
In short, all Boston takes a drop,
And worships T. A. and the Pop.

The multitude assembled all,
A hush pervades old Music Hall.
He upward raises his right hand,
The music flows beneath his wand,
The girls who watch his figure swaying
Quite forget the fiddles playing.

The silence now is quite intense,
The smoke curls up in columns dense,
When suddenly, some murmurs rise,
T. A. looks round in cold surprise,
Another murmur, louder, shrill.
A glance from him, severe and chill.
One haughty look around the hall,
Then hushed and quiet are we all.
His back he turns on eager faces,
His baton wields with airs and graces,
The music rises, swells and—stops.
'Tis intermission at the Pops.

Applause arises from the floor,
He blandly signifies, encore.
Another joyous clap and shout
The fiddles then file slowly out.
He from the platform lightly skips
And round to Fashion's table slips.

He smiles and bows to left and right,
And grasps the hand of wealth and might.
He gaily quaffs the foaming beer,
To chatter lends a willing ear,
While those outside the ring look on
And wish they, too, were of the ton (or baton).

Another leader enters now.
Fashion's own, to whom we bow.
Flash merry jest; flow bubbling wit!
The rest of us are out of it.
(All conversation's flat and tame
Of those who are unknown to fame.)

Intermission now is o'er,
T. A. strides across the floor,
Up the platform steps he prances,
Followed by adoring glances.
The fiddles all in tune are going,
Music o'er our souls is flowing.
To our lips we raise our glasses,
Blessing Pops for levelling classes.

Now a pause; then a smile from the great T. A.,
Then a burst of applause from the audience gay.
A lingering quaver; a full, short stop.
Exit leader: ditto fiddles; finis Pop.

A Boston Critic Criticised.

UNDER the heading "Music" in a recent copy of the "Saturday Evening Gazette," of Boston, I find a gem of such musicianly acumen that it would do credit to the ability and good taste of—"the horse reporter" shall I say? And I cannot let it pass into oblivion without calling the attention of THE MUSICAL COURIER's readers to some of its salient points.

The article purports to be a reply to THE MUSICAL COURIER's recent criticism of Mr. Paur, the present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which article THE MUSICAL COURIER stated that Mr. Paur had been an artistic and a business failure, a fact that it would seem idle to question.

This Boston critic, from the stronghold of his office, which he is pleased to call "a benighted spot"—I have no wish to quarrel with a term so unusually truthful—has heard no murmur regarding Mr. Paur's lack of success; neither has he even dreamed of hearing Mr. Paur's ability questioned.

If this critic wishes to laud his protégé and is able to find great merit where other and more competent critics can find none, there is, I suppose, nothing to discuss—save his taste. In his last article, however, "the Boston man" has given us one more of those vindictive attacks upon Mr. Nikisch, of about the same nature as the venomous and spiteful articles with which Mr. Nikisch was persecuted while in this country, and is not yet free from, although it is now nearly a year since he left America. Quite time enough for jealous rage to grow cool, one would think!

But, by some curious mathematical arrangement, no word of flattery for Mr. Paur is complete without a disparaging reference to Mr. Nikisch. In this latest article even Mr. Nikisch's clothing is not free from this fellow's musicianly criticism. Nikisch's cuffs and shoes claim so much of this critic's time and thought that one would fancy he had served his apprenticeship in a haberdasher's shop prior to turning his mighty endowments in the direction of musical criticism—God save the mark!

That Mr. Nikisch had the temerity to direct in accordance with his own musical individuality, in preference to taking the meddling advice of "a third rate" critic, is no vital reason why the public should be forced to accept pages of vulgar personality in lieu of musical criticism. Indeed, in this fellow's work during the past year I can remember no criticism of a Symphony concert that did not contain some attack upon Mr. Nikisch; but venom and malice usually overreach themselves, and the man should remember that "sharp wits, like sharp knives, do oftentimes cut their owner's fingers!"

To quote the man's own words: "The paltriness, the vindictiveness and the small malice that characterize these systematic and unprovoked attacks" upon Mr. Nikisch,

March, Queen of Sheba.....	Gounod
Overture, The Bronze Horse.....	Auber
Waltz, Harlequin en Voyage.....	Zach
Selection, Aida.....	Verdi
Ballet music, Ueber Allen.....	Lassen
Polonaise.....	Liszt
Prelude, The Deluge, solo violin.....	Saint-Saens
Mr I Schnitzler.....
Overture, Rienzi.....	Wagner
Selection, Princess Trebizonde.....	Offenbach
Waltz, Magnolia Blossoms (first time.).....	De Koven
Mazourka, Unparteiische Kritik.....	Joh Strauss
Rakoczy march.....	Berlioz

AN IMPRESSION OF THE POPS.

The following, written with lead pencil, in a neat feminine hand, evidently an impromptu, was recently picked up under one of the tables frequented by the most fashionable visitors to the popular concerts at Music Hall:

ADAM-HOUSE-KEY.

His name suggests his genius bright
"The first to open doors of light."
He stands, behind a row of palms,
With baton raised and outstretched arms.

All praise too faint for the patron saint
Of beer and music, smoke and babble,
Wit profound and senseless gabble.

The Summer girls with frou-frou laces
The Harvard men, with studious faces,
The debutante who's all the rage,
With chaperone of middle age,
The business man from care released,
The doctor, lawyer, author, priest,
The matron staid, the giddy maid—
In short, all Boston takes a drop,
And worships T. A. and the Pop.

The multitude assembled all,
A hush pervades old Music Hall.
He upward raises his right hand,
The music flows beneath his wand,
The girls who watch his figure swaying
Quite forget the fiddles playing.

The silence now is quite intense,
The smoke curls up in columns dense,
When suddenly, some murmurs rise.
T. A. looks round in cold surprise,
Another murmur, louder, shrill.
A glance from him, severe and chill.
One haughty look around the hall,
Then hushed and quiet are we all.
His back he turns on eager faces,
His baton wields with airs and graces,
The music rises, swells and—stops.
'Tis intermission at the Pops.

Applause arises from the floor,
He blandly signifies, encore.
Another joyous clap and shout
The fiddles then file slowly out.
He from the platform lightly skips
And round to Fashion's table slips.

He smiles and bows to left and right,
And grasps the hand of wealth and might.
He gaily quaffs the foaming beer,
To chatter lends a willing ear,
While those outside the ring look on
And wish they, too, were of the ton (or baton).

Another leader enters now.
Fashion's own, to whom we bow.
Flash merry jest; flow bubbling wit!
The rest of us are out of it.
(All conversation's flat and tame
Of those who are unknown to fame.)

Intermission now is o'er,
T. A. strides across the floor,
Up the platform steps he prances,
Followed by adoring glances.
The fiddles all in tune are going,
Music o'er our souls is flowing.
To our lips we raise our glasses,
Blessing Pops for levelling classes.

Now a pause; then a smile from the great T. A.,
Then a burst of applause from the audience gay.
A lingering quaver; a full, short stop.
Exit leader; ditto fiddles; finis Pop.

A Boston Critic Criticised.

UNDER the heading "Music" in a recent copy of the "Saturday Evening Gazette," of Boston, I find a gem of such musicianly acumen that it would do credit to the ability and good taste of—"the horse reporter" shall I say? And I cannot let it pass into oblivion without calling the attention of THE MUSICAL COURIER's readers to some of its salient points.

The article purports to be a reply to THE MUSICAL COURIER's recent criticism of Mr. Paur, the present leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which article THE MUSICAL COURIER stated that Mr. Paur had been an artistic and a business failure, a fact that it would seem idle to question.

This Boston critic, from the stronghold of his office, which he is pleased to call "a benighted spot"—I have no wish to quarrel with a term so unusually truthful—has heard no murmur regarding Mr. Paur's lack of success; neither has he even dreamed of hearing Mr. Paur's ability questioned.

If this critic wishes to laud his protégé and is able to find great merit where other and more competent critics can find none, there is, I suppose, nothing to discuss—save his taste. In his last article, however, "the Boston man" has given us one more of those vindictive attacks upon Mr. Nikisch, of about the same nature as the venomous and spiteful articles with which Mr. Nikisch was persecuted while in this country, and is not yet free from, although it is now nearly a year since he left America. Quite time enough for jealous rage to grow cool, one would think!

But, by some curious mathematical arrangement, no word of flattery for Mr. Paur is complete without a disparaging reference to Mr. Nikisch. In this latest article even Mr. Nikisch's clothing is not free from this fellow's musicianly criticism. Nikisch's cuffs and shoes claim so much of this critic's time and thought that one would fancy he had served his apprenticeship in a haberdasher's shop prior to turning his mighty endowments in the direction of musical criticism—God save the mark!

That Mr. Nikisch had the temerity to direct in accordance with his own musical individuality, in preference to taking the meddling advice of "a third rate" critic, is no vital reason why the public should be forced to accept pages of vulgar personality in lieu of musical criticism. Indeed, in this fellow's work during the past year I can remember no criticism of a Symphony concert that did not contain some attack upon Mr. Nikisch; but venom and malice usually overreach themselves, and the man should remember that "sharp wits, like sharp knives, do oftentimes cut their owner's fingers!"

To quote the man's own words: "The paltriness, the vindictiveness and the small malice that characterize these systematic and unprovoked attacks" upon Mr. Nikisch, have received the most scathing criticism by the public, and I doubt whether the writer's sense of satisfaction would be quite so strong were he to hear the disgusted expressions of fair minded people against this method of work so peculiarly his own.

Perhaps the opinion of some of his readers would outweigh the doubtful success of such literary ventures, although I suppose the relief experienced by this embittered or dyspeptic apostle of mediocrity must be great, when, from the safe harbor of his "benighted spot," he can continue to attack a man far enough away to be unconscious of moles that burrow in Boston. In the article which has occasioned this letter the man has found room to criticise the English of THE MUSICAL COURIER (the other aspersions are unworthy of notice). It was, however, a bit superfluous for him to state that he does not understand the difference between "a first-rate" and a "second-rate" conductor—his articles show this so plainly that no confession is necessary. May I aid in so worthy a cause?

Mr. Nikisch is a "first-rate" conductor! If the Boston man will take the trouble to borrow a Worcester's Dictionary, he will find the word "first-rate" defined as "Pre-eminent, superior, best," and if he is gifted with a fair amount of intelligence, he can then realize the meaning of the word "second-rate" as applied to Mr. Paur—if not Worcester will again help him! In the mean time this man's refined use of the word "sloppy" is to be commended to all students of good English, commended both as an elegant term, and one calculated to make the person using it, hypercritical as to the diction of any literary work!

It really seems too bad that so much rancor should be thought necessary to insure Mr. Paur's success, but sad to relate, even in Boston where he has been most continuously "boomed" his has been but a "succès d'estime."

Should the man from Boston have difficulty in understanding either of these terms, I shall be glad to furnish him with a glossary, which, although it does not contain the delightful word "sloppy" contains others of equal force, that are less offensive to ears polite.

Now as a parting suggestion—since his motives are so patent to all—would it not be well for the man to leave all other musicians out of his dissertations and proclaim at once, "There is no god but Paur and Woolf is his Prophet?"

R. G. BROWN.

Boston, Mass., April 20, 1894.

Emil Paur—a Man to be Envied.

By CHANNING ELLERY.

FOR who must not envy a man that has the great good fortune to be the leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?

Some years ago when Mr. Paur was first engaged by Col. Higginson for his post of high honor, and when preliminary photographs of the new conductor began to appear in illustrated magazines and music store windows, I openly declared myself to be disappointed, for on looking at Emil Paur's counterfeit presentment I seemed to behold a man who would be inclined towards angularity in his readings and who would stand at the head of his band like a graven image and direct it with metronomic precision.

This only shows of what crimes a photographer can be guilty, for it was purely and simply the fault of the man who posed Mr. Paur for his picture that I made such utterly fallacious inferences. These false impressions of mine were dissipated at once and for all time when I heard the Boston Orchestra play for the first time under its new leader's direction. In Mr. Paur, instead of a severe, formal, unbending person all angles, I gazed upon a man fairly brimming over with temperament, exhaling magnetism and conducting his band with mercurial energy; a man so full of musical feeling that stone statues even might catch the spirit of his burning enthusiasm and respond to it in kind.

But Emil Paur—enviable man!—I cannot help repeating the sentiment—had not stone statues to deal with, but four score men of flesh and blood—artists every one of them, from the first violin to the snare-drum and the triangle.

Said the great leader to me the other morning over his cup of coffee: "It's the greatest orchestra in the world, this Boston Symphony Orchestra. Every man in it is an accomplished soloist, every one a thorough musician with high ideals in art, and they have been playing together many of them for seventeen years. You cannot imagine the unspeakable satisfaction it is for a conductor to have such a body of men under his direction. It is for me exactly as though I stood up in front of these eighty musicians and they were welded into one glorious instrument, upon which I play at will. So quick are they to catch my slightest meaning that it seems as though my thoughts were transmitted to them by means of some mental telegraphic process. They seem to feel my wishes before I express them either by look or gesture."

* * *

I know not why—probably the fault of that wretched photographer again—but I had fancied somehow that Mr.

EMIL PAUR'S HOME AT JAMAICA PLAINS.

Paur was a North German and was therefore surprised to hear him say he was an Austrian, a native of Czernowitz. Do any of you know where Czernowitz is better than I, or will you have to consult a map and study it for a quarter of an hour before being any the wiser? That is what I did, and to save you a like expenditure of time, I will inform you that Czernowitz is far off in the very easternmost corner of Austria, away round the corner of Hungary in a province called Bukowina, fairly bordering on Russia. No wonder that Paur has a militant musical organization, having been born in a land which is in close contact with Hungary, Russia and Roumania. The people thereabouts, even though—as the leader declares—his native town is a very German one, are infected more or less just by contact with the fever of the Oriental and the Slav.

Talk about countries and differences of race led to an exchange of views on questions of music. I asked Mr. Paur his opinion of the Russians who are coming to the fore nowadays with compositions for orchestra. Of course he considers Tschaiakowsky a giant in music—no real musician could think otherwise—but he regards the younger men as more or less imitators and declares that while much of their music has charming melody and captivating rhythm, one is apt to tire of it if he hears it very often, "for," says the conductor, "there is but little polyphony in it and an orchestral score that is always monophonus begins, after much repetition, to pall upon those who are called upon to interpret it constantly."

"The Russian school, however," continued Mr. Paur, "is full of talent and it certainly promises great achievement in the future—more, perhaps, than the German—for really in Germany there is at present no really great man in music save Richard Strauss. Him I regard as a true genius, a veritable master in music. Of the Russians whose compositions we are now playing I think my preference is for Rimsky-Korsakoff whose 'Scheherazade' you will remember we gave the other night in New York, and whose 'Antar' we have more recently presented in Boston. This latter is to me a most interesting work."

Wagner still furnishes food for discussion, as great innovators always do for decades after they are dead and buried. I told Mr. Paur that many of The Concert-Goer's readers regard me as an anti-Wagner crank, because I confess frankly that the music of the Bayreuth Colossus palls upon me and irritates my nerves after a half hour of listening.

"That," said my host in reply, "is much the same manner in which Wagner's music affects me when I listen to it for any great length of time. In playing it I am so deeply interested in the wonders of its construction and my attention is so acutely given to the interpretation that I am not conscious of fatigue; but if I attend a performance of one of the later works, I find that I have enough at the end of one act. The more keenly sensitive a man is to music and the more intelligently he listens to it the more quickly he becomes fatigued by Wagner's music, because he is able to distinguish perfectly all the convolutions of the orchestral score, to see the meaning of each phrase and to realize the reasoning back of it all. A man who follows this complex composition with his mind as well as his ears is bound to become weary before the first hour shall have slipped by—to have a headache and a combative feeling against Wagner and all he ever composed.

"With the 'dilettante,'" pursued Mr. Paur, "it is quite different; they do not take the thing so seriously. These absorb general effects; they hear the music as a whole, they watch the dramatis personae with a complacent interest and they derive immense pleasure from the stage pictures and accessories. After four hours they emerge fresh and smiling from the opera house and declare that they 'have enjoyed themselves so much' and that 'there is no one to compare with Wagner.'"

Mr. Paur thinks that only at Bayreuth is it possible for a genuinely musical listener to absorb an entire Wagner music-drama in one day without undue mental and nervous fatigue.

"At Bayreuth," he says, "one gets right into an atmosphere surcharged with Wagner; he makes up his mind to cast aside for a time the cares of his every-day life and gives himself up without reserve to art. Then, too, the dramas are presented with long intermissions between the several acts, during which the entire audience seeks the refreshment of the outer air, and the harmless glass of Munchener, and returns each time with its system toned up to meet the strain of another act."

Mr. Paur says that the presentations of the Wagner works at Bayreuth are particularly remarkable for the perfection of the stage management and the magnificence of the various stage pictures.

"Mme. Cosima Wagner is a wonderfully clever stage manager," he declares, "and her taste in that respect is infallible. As a woman she resembles greatly her renowned father, Franz Liszt; she is, like him, rather plain and unattractive until she begins to speak, and then she at once exercises a strong magnetic influence over the person whom she is addressing, and he ceases to wonder at the hold she has over people and the power which she manifests in bending them to her will."

Mr. Paur is thoroughly wedded to Boston and agrees with me that there is much more of musical atmosphere there than in New York (I am a New Yorker and consider, therefore, that I can abuse it to my heart's content). Why should there not be a strong musical atmosphere in Boston, I should like to know, when its magnificent orchestra has been playing for it regularly twice a week for fifteen or so years past? Of course Bostonians, who, as we all know, run to culture anyway, have more real musical appreciation than the nervous, excitable, heterogeneous mass known as the "musical public" of New York.

"You people," exclaims Mr. Paur, "lose sight of principles in art while chasing after personalities. You set an artist upon an altar and fall down and worship him blindly until another comes along who appeals more strongly to your admiration, when you straightway leave your first love in the lurch and transfer your devotion to your second. Now in Boston they are far more apt to love the abstract art than the concrete artist."

All of which I subscribe to quite humbly, Mr. Paur. We are going to reform though and I see the first glow of hope in the increased audiences which the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been attracting in the metropolis from season to season. During the two past seasons the growth of public patronage for these unequalled musical entertainments has been most marked, and Mr. Paur is frankly gratified at this fact.

"Last season," he said, "I was much pleased at the large increase of our subscription; this year I have been perfectly delighted at the size and enthusiasm of our audiences."

Speaking of the permanent orchestra question, Mr. Paur declared that he thought the only system by which the plan of a permanent orchestra could be carried out was that pursued in Boston—the one-man power. He says: "Until you find a man like Mr. Higginson ready to assume the cost and the entire responsibility of such an organization, you can hardly hope for success. If there are committees and a whole lot of people all pulling different ways in order to further the interests of some particular man or men, there will result no appreciable or lasting benefit to art."

* * *

I asked Mr. Paur if he intended going abroad this summer for his vacation. He said that he had not yet decided as to what he would do. "I do not enjoy traveling alone," he said, "and it is very costly to travel in Europe with one's entire family, and railroading over there is most fatiguing at best."

"What!" I queried in astonishment. "you a German and not prefer the European methods of traveling?"

"I can scarcely imagine a worse punishment," he exclaimed with decision, "than to take a long unbroken journey in a European railway train. You have scarcely any conveniences, it is unbearably hot, you are crowded, you cannot breathe, you open the window and in a few moments you are begrimed with dirt. Why, it does not compare in comfort with your American railroading."

"Well, I quite agree with you, but I know a young man from your country who roundly asserts that such a thing as dirt is unknown in Germany and that if there be such a thing as earthly bliss it is found in a railway train in the Fatherland." (I will say parenthetically that this young Prussian and I have more than once torn both the English and German languages to tatters in a bellicose discussion over the comparative merits of American and European systems of railway traveling. I have stood in pickle for you, my young friend.)

"Where is he from?" asks the great conductor, much interested.

"From Berlin."

"Oho!" laughs Mr. Paur, "one might have known that. Natives or residents of the Prussian capital are perfectly satisfied in their own minds that nothing good can exist out of their neighborhood. When a Berliner is visiting some other great city and you call upon him to admire its beauties, he shrugs his shoulders, assumes a patronizing air and says, 'Ja, ja, schön, schön; sie sollten aber Berlin sehen.' (Yes, yes, very fine indeed; but you should see Berlin.)"

"Here in America I am inclined to believe in this same manner regarding Boston," continued Mr. Paur. "I think it is one of the most beautiful cities in the world; it has much of the charm of an old-world town, united with most of the advantages that accompany American civilization. For a home I know of no more delightful city anywhere."

Indeed, as I sit here in my office listening to the confused echoes rising from noisy Broadway, I think with a sigh of longing of Boston's lovely suburbs, those places where there are such beautiful homes, arching elm-trees, verdant lawns, fresh air and rest—and all but a short half hour from the throbbing heart of a great center of culture and commerce.

Emil Paur has a home at Jamaica Plains.

Now, is he not a man to be envied and is not my title a most apt one?

Some of the New York music critics continue to object to Mr. Paur. One of these writers inveighed at great length against him in last Sunday's Times, and took occasion to comment forcibly, but civilly, on what has appeared in the GAZETTE on the subject. The trend of his argument, however, is chiefly a defence of Mr. Nikisch. He concedes frankly that the orchestra deteriorated under Mr. Nikisch, but seems to think that this was atoned for by the "conductor's search after other and—in his mind—more important things." As far as our experience in Boston may be taken as evidence of Mr. Nikisch's "more important things," they were principally confined to the imparting of an operatic color to everything he conducted. The Times writer, in dwelling on the orchestra under Mr. Gericke, says: "The irresistible snap and incisiveness that were noted when Mr. Gericke first brought the orchestra here, are gone," whereas, if there was anything that the orchestra's playing under Mr. Gericke lacked, it was "snap and incisiveness." There were wonderful precision, finish and clearness, following a discipline that never relaxed; but, despite its technical beauty, the performances were pedagogic in effect. Of "snap" there was nothing. Mr. Nikisch had "snap," and subjugated all the proprieties to it. With all due respect to those New York critics who are so excited over Mr. Paur, we feel that it is not possible that they can know as much about him and his skill as a conductor, as is known by the music critics of Boston; firstly, because the latter have had the experience of twenty-two concerts directed by him, while the New Yorkers have only heard him at some half-dozen, more or less; and, secondly, because the Boston critics are fully as well, if not better, equipped to pass judgment on such matters as are the men of New York. We have had six months of Mr. Paur, and in that time he has restored the orchestra to the efficiency it lost under the showy and unconscientious control of Mr. Nikisch, who was more concerned for himself than for the music he attempted to interpret. Not only this, but under Mr. Paur the orchestra plays with greater warmth, brilliancy, incisiveness and fluency than have ever before attended its performances. The consensus of critical opinion here supports these facts. That criticism which can accept the sickly sentimental readings of Mr. Nikisch in preference to the manly readings of Mr. Paur, speaks its own worthlessness. The Times writer seems to think that the GAZETTE has objected to unfavorable discussion of Mr. Paur by the New York critics. If so, he is in error. What the GAZETTE objects to is the injustice with which Mr. Paur has been treated in New York, and to the apparent determination that exists there to "down him" at any cost. The sincerity and the value of New York musical criticism are not set at a very high rate in Boston, for various unpleasant reasons on which it would be painful to dwell. When it combines in a concerted attack on an artist, and treats him with insulting arrogance, after he has met with favor in a community that is quite as musical as is New York, and quite as capable of judging music and its performances, the inevitable conclusion here is, that there is considerable axe-grinding under way for somebody. Discuss Mr. Paur, by all means, but at least have the discretion to refrain from setting up such twaddling conducting as that of Mr. Nikisch as a standard by which to judge him.

Some of the statements in the Times are remarkable. For instance, it says: "The fact is, that ability as a disciplinarian is not all that is required in a conductor. Neither will intelligent study be sufficient. There must be some musical temperament which can communicate its warmth to the men of the orchestra. Mr. Paur has not shown anything of this kind." But that is just what he has shown. He has musical temperament, and has communicated its warmth to the men of the orchestra, for, as we have said, they have not, under any previous conductor, played with so much warmth. The performance of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, last week, bore ample evidence to that fact, and, in the whole existence of the orchestra, it has never done warmer or more perfect work. When the Times says that the orchestra "plays smoothly, correctly, glibly, if you will, but with deadly dullness," it shows that the writer is not filled with the spirit of fairness. Nor is it any potent argument against the capacity of Boston to judge of a conductor's efficiency, by referring flippantly to her "provincial limits." By and by the New York critics will recover from the malady of Nikischitis under which they are at present suffering, and then they will be clearer in judgment, even if they should not be fairer in spirit.

The Times has, at least, conducted its argument with dignity. Not so the Musical Courier, which returned, last week, to the attack on Mr. Paur, with all the bitterness and the offensive personalities that have characterized its treatment of Mr. Paur from the outset. Not only this, but it adheres to the misrepresentations in which it has steadily indulged. However, it is something in the nature of a compliment to be abused by the Courier, and its power to do injury is immeasurably, almost ludicrously out of proportion to its gleeful eagerness to work it. Without any hesitation, it announces that "Mr. Higginson has grown very tired of his new man." And yet we doubt if Mr. Higginson has taken the Courier into his confidence. The Courier is probably indebted for its information to some one or more of the disgruntled violinists who have busied themselves in inveighing against Mr. Paur in return for the discipline to which he has subjected them. It repeats its offensive flat: "Mr. Paur must go," evidently firm in the faith that New York, as represented by the Courier, is all powerful in Boston. We are told, "New York will not have Emil Paur. Mr. Paur must go!" New York is less influential here than is imagined by the Courier, for according to that veracious and highly respectable periodical, New York did want Arthur Nikisch,—and yet Arthur Nikisch's services were willingly dispensed with, and musical Boston has not given as much as one sigh for his departure. We are afraid that the Musical Courier is not yet in a position to cause Mr. Paur's dismissal. The wonder of it all is that New York should be so agitated over Mr. Paur. That city has Mr. Damrosch and Mr. Seidl, and is likely to have Mr. Theodore Thomas. It would seem that, in its wealth of conductors of its own, it had enough to attend to without troubling itself so greatly about Boston's conductor. Perhaps New York does not trouble itself, after all, and that all this pother by a few music critics, is of a limited, personal nature, rather than an expression of general opinion. It is not long since these writers decided that Walter Damrosch "must go," and yet that gentleman is still at the fore. They have entered upon a combined opposition to Theodore Thomas, and yet the indications are that they will fail to write him down. Something must be wrong. Can it be that these writers are not so very influential, after all?

Gazette

CONTINUED ON NEXT REEL